I have been glued to the TV and the papers ever since. This week, the police are re-opening Tavistock Square, and the cars and buses will go through again. That will include me, because though I will be scared, I'm damned if I see why these mamzerim should stop me from leading a normal life. London has seen these people off before: the Nazis, the IRA, and now, perhaps, Al Qaeda. It's still my city.

Housing ministry to shift national priorities

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a move to bolster its Jewish character, Israel has started to channel funds for new housing from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to the Galilee and the Negev, an Israeli cabinet minister disclosed in a conference call with North American journalists last week.

"We've shifted our order of priorities," Isaac Herzog, the Israeli minister of construction and housing, told the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations in New York City.

Since the 1967 Six Day War, the Israeli government has invested heavily in housing in the territories. But from now on, the emphasis will be reversed, suggested Herzog, the Labor party's chief whip in the Knesset.

"We're trying to bring new people to the Galilee and the Negev," he said, describing them as areas of "future growth" in Israel.

At present, there is an Arab majority in the Galilee, and the Negev is under-populated.

Last month, Herzog, the son of former Israeli president Chaim Herzog, stopped work on 50 construction sites in unauthorized outposts in the West Bank.

He was speaking last week ahead of Israel's scheduled withdrawal from Gaza and four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank.

Herzog said the Labor party joined Prime Ministter Ariel Sharon's coalition government to ensure that the disengagement, slated to begin in mid-August, is carried out in full.

There is no chance it will be delayed, he declared, saying a postponement would be "unfeasible and unrealistic."

Settlers who think the withdrawal will be postponed are labouring under an illusion, Herzog asserted.

The withdrawal is important for demographic reasons, as it will help assure a clear Jewish majority in Israel, he explained, addng that the alternative is a one-state solution.

Calling it "futile" to retain an island of almost 8,000 Jews in a sea of more than one million Palestinians in Gaza, Herzog said 40,000 soldiers will be deployed to evacuate the Jewish settlers.

He called the planned pullout, which will cost Israel $1.5 billion (US) over three years, "a complex and painful process."

Many of the settlers who have accepted the withdrawal want to be resettled as a group. All of them will have access to new homes in the northern Negev or around Ashkelon.

Most settlers will co-operate, but "a strong nucleus" will resist and try to derail the withdrawal, even by force, Herzog predicted.

Some of the settlers agitating against the disengagement by day are negotiating with the government at night, he said.

He accused some of them of whipping up fears that Israel will face a major terrorist threat after its withdrawal from Gaza.

Downplaying this scenario, Herzog said Gaza may be as relatively quiet as southern Lebanon, which Israel relinquished five years ago in a similar unilateral withdrawal.

If necessary, he added, Israel will use vigorous military means to quell terrorism originating from Gaza.

"If we have to go back to Gaza, we'll do it big time."

He warned the Palestinians that Israel is not leaving under duress, but in accordance with its strategic interests.

In the meantime, Israel wants assurances from the Palestinian Authority that it can manage Gaza after the last Israeli troops leave.

Israel intends to remove synagogues and graves from the settlements, but a decision has yet to be made on whether the settlers' homes will be demolished, Herzog said.

His personal preference is for the buildings to be left intact. He said the Palestinians want the buildings to be levelled so that high-density neighbourhoods can be built.

As for the settlers' greenhouses, some may be left for Palestinian farmers, he said.

Herzog did not speak about the status of the remaining settlements in the West Bank after Israel's withdrawal, but he did say that finishing the separation fence should be Israel's priority.

Without elaborating, he said Israel may take additional unilateral steps in the territories.

Israel to have largest Jewish population by 2006

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will have the largest Jewish population in the world by 2006, when it will surpass the United States for the first time in history, the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute said Monday.

Planning institute president Avinoam Bar-Yosef presented the research group's annual report on "the situation of the Jewish people" to the Knesset immigration and absorption committee on Monday. The institute, which is partly funded by the Jewish Agency, concluded that the State of Israel is the single guarantee of the Jewish people's continued existence. Bar-Yosef will submit the report to the government next week.

Today about 5.28 million Jews live in the U.S., with 5.235 million living in Israel.

The report projects how many Jews there will be in 2020. Israel is the only country in the world expected to see significant growth in the size of its Jewish population, while all other communities in the world are expected to shrink or remain stable. The overall number of Jews in the world is expected to rise by half a million people.

The Jerusalem-based institute predicts that there will be 6.25 million Jews in Israel in 2020, compared to 5.25 million Jews today. In North America, the number of Jews is expected to remain stable, at about 5.5 million. The number of Jews in Europe is expected to drop from 1.25 million to 1 million. In the former Soviet Union, the number of Jews is expected to shrink from 380,000 to 180,000.

The rate of assimilation is expected to be slightly less than 50 per cent in the U.S., 60 per cent in Germany and Hungary, and 80 per cent in the former Soviet Union.

Highs and lows for Canada at Maccabiah

The start of the 17th annual Maccabiah Games was an event-filled one for Canadian teams.

Canada's soccer team stunned defending champion Argentina with a 1-0 upset win on Monday. Shmulik Hazan of Thornhill, Ont., scored what turned out to be the only goal, in the 20th minute, after the Canadian forward took a pass from Isaac Levy, also of Thornhill, and his 25-foot kick found the upper left corner of the net.

"It was instant jubilation," said Hazan, a former member of Canada's under-16 national team. "The goal was big, but even bigger was the success of frustrating Argentina's defence in the final half."

Another Thornhill player, Canadian goalkeeper Colin Berenhaut made three outstanding saves in the final 10 minutes of the game.

"This win was huge and against a country that has traditionally put together some very strong teams," said Canadian coach Salim Brahimi of Montreal.

It was the first time Canada had entered a soccer team in these Games.

In men's softball on Sunday, Canada blew a 3-0 lead and lost to the United States 10-3 – suffering its worst defeat in the history of the Games. However, the team redeemed itself somewhat, crushing Mexico 9-2 on Monday, in a game they led from the start. Adam Sargon of Toronto hit a home run in this game to give Canada a 4-0 first inning lead.

On Monday, the United States had a four-run fifth inning to come from behind and beat Canada 6-4 in men's baseball. Mark Nadler of Montreal hit a two-run RBI single in the bottom of the fourth that tied the game at 2-2, but the United States got to pitcher Stephen Osterer of Ottawa in the top of the fifth with four runs on seven hits.

In Jerusalem, Canada's first win of the Maccabiah games came from the Junior Womens basketball team. Ahead 32-27 at halftime, Canada went on to beat Australia 63-51. Ali Cherniak of Toronto was the game's top scorer with 16 points while Montrealers Randi Kosinstone and Lauren Tajfel each added 11.

The Canadian Junior Womens soccer team opened the Games on Sunday – but with a loss. They trailed shortly after the start of the game and ended up on the losing end of a 4-2 game with Mexico. Down 3-1 at halftime, Canadian goal scorers were Liora Berger of Richmond Hill, Ont., and Nicole Markowitz of Toronto. Canada missed seven scoring chances in the final half.

G-8 nations promise $3 billion to the PA

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — The world's industrialized nations backed plans last week to pump $3 billion into the Palestinian Authority economy over the next three years as part of efforts to secure peace in the Middle East.

International special envoy James Wolfensohn, helping coordinate Israel's planned Gaza withdrawal, sold the plan to leaders of the Group of Eight (G-8) nations during a three-day summit in Scotland.

"When the disengagement plan happens over the next few weeks, it is essential we build the infrastructure of a state on the Palestinian side. This money can help us do this," British Prime Minister Tony Blair told reporters.

Wolfensohn, a special envoy for the "Quartet" of the United States, Russia, European Union and United Nations, said last month he wanted the cash for projects that could include a seaport and infrastructure programs in Gaza.

Palestinian officials welcomed the announcement, but said the money must be disbursed quickly to help rebuild the Gaza Strip after Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip this summer.

Faryar Shirzad, the senior U.S. negotiator at the G-8 summit, said a key part of what Wolfensohn was going to do was to "widen the circle of donors, including donors in the Arab world."

Third summit seen

Mahmoud Abbas said he expects to meet Ariel Sharon before Israel withdraws from the Gaza Strip in August. The Palestinian Authority president has met the Israeli prime minister twice since succeeding the late Yasser Arafat, but the last summit, in June, was marred by mutual recrimination over renewed fighting in Gaza. "I said that the meeting was difficult and the results were small. But there was agreement on continuing contacts and holding another meeting with the Israeli prime minister after completing preparations that can lead to better results," Abbas told the London-based Asharq al-Awsat newspaper. "It will be before the date of the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza." Israeli officials said no date has been set for a third summit.

Israel helps in comet science

Israeli astronomers provided America with data on the U.S. aircraft that struck a comet last week. The Jerusalem Post reported that Noah Brosch, director of the Wise Observatory in Mitzpe Ramon, said Israel is the only country from Australia to Western Europe with skies clear enough to obtain useful data. "We are at the right longitude to provide data," Brosch said. "China was a partner, but there was rain and they couldn't see anything. We, of course, have clear skies over Mitzpe Ramon at this time of year." Scientists say the data provided by the collision could reveal details about the origins of the solar system.

Lynching probe deepens

A second Israeli was arrested in connection with the attempted lynching of a Palestinian rock-thrower in Gaza. The 19-year-old suspect, from the West Bank city of Kiryat Arba, was taken into custody after police identified him among a crowd of activists alleged to have stoned the Palestinian during confrontations in the Gaza village of Muwassi last week. Another suspect was also arrested last week. Televised images of the attack on the Palestinian, who was injured while in army custody, prompted Israeli authorities to pledge a crackdown on individuals who constitute the core of political opposition to the upcoming Gaza withdrawal.

Indictment in attack on gays

Yishai Shlisel, a resident of the haredi community of Kiryat Sefer, was charged with attempted murder after being arrested during this month's stabbing spree at Jerusalem's gay pride parade. Three people who took part in the parade were wounded. The suspect was quoted by the media as saying in Jerusalem District Court that he acted on God's orders. City Hall had tried unsuccessfully to ban the annual parade, arguing it would offend the religious sensibilities of many Jerusalem residents.

Cash sought for Gaza plan

Israeli officials are expected in Washington, D.C., this week to ask for special funding for the Gaza Strip pullout. They're seeking hundreds of millions of dollars to help re-house evacuees in the Negev and Galilee regions.

Two terrorists slain

Security forces killed two Palestinian terrorists in the West Bank and Gaza Strip last week. A two-man cell from the Al-Aqsa Brigades tried to ambush Jews en route to Joseph's Tomb outside Nablus on July 7, but they were fired on by troops guarding the pilgrims. One terrorist was killed. Hours earlier, soldiers repelled an Islamic Jihad attack on Morag, in the Gaza Strip, killing one gunman and wounding another.

Police chief urges calm

Israel's police chief urged settlers slated for evacuation not to resort to violence. "The soldiers and police are carrying out their mission as empowered by law. It is important to remember that after the disengagement, a new day will dawn, and that we as police will continue to protect and serve the evacuated residents anywhere else in the country," Moshe Karadi said.

SPIRITUAL DEDICATION

A new spiritual centre for Ethiopian Jews was recently opened in Ramle, a town 20 kilometres southeast of Tel Aviv that has a large population of Ethiopian Jews. Over the past few years, Keren Hayesod (United Israel Appeal) has helped to establish 13 spiritual centres for the Ethiopian Jewish community in Israel.

Le Monde guilty verdict sparks debate

By LAUREN ELKIN
JTA

PARIS — What began as a debate about freedom of the press after the appearance of a fiercely anti-Israel article has devolved into a clash of special interest groups.

In late May, a Versailles court of appeals found Le Monde, France's newspaper of record, guilty of "racial defamation" for a June 4, 2002 article titled "Israel-Palestine: The Cancer."

It's not the first time the French media have asked where exactly the dividing line lies between legitimate criticism of Israel and anti-Semitism, but it is the first time the pro-Israel side has won its case in court. The decision, therefore, was initially welcomed in the Jewish community.

In the past month, however, the French intellectual elite has re-centred the debate around the figure of Edgar Morin, one of the article's three authors.

Morin, who is Jewish, is a well-respected sociologist and a member of France's intellectual elite. Some see the controversy over the treatment of Israel in the French media being co-opted by the intellectuals at Morin's side, who claim the debate about free speech for themselves.

Any gratification the Jewish community initially took in the ruling has turned to outrage as the controversy has evolved, and as Morin's backers attempt to "contextualize" the article, blunting its explicit anti-Semitism.

The court cited two particular passages from the article as racist. The first reads: "One has trouble imagining that a nation of refugees, descendants of the people who have suffered the longest period of persecution in the history of humanity, who have suffered the worst possible scorn and humiliation, would be capable of transforming themselves, in two generations, into a dominating people, sure of themselves, and, with the exception of an admirable minority, into a scornful people finding satisfaction in humiliating others."

The second citation reads, "The Jews, once subject to an unmerciful rule, now impose their unmerciful rule on the Palestinians."

The court ruled that the article's offence rests in the implication that "all the Jews of Israel humiliate the Palestinians for their own satisfaction" and that "all Jews around the world" take part in this satisfaction and persecution.

The prosecuting groups – France-Israel and Lawyers Without Borders – sought the equivalent of approximately $18,000 (US) in damages. The court awarded each group the equivalent of approximately $3,583 in legal fees and a symbolic $1 for damages, and Le Monde was ordered to print a retraction.

But the story is far from over: the fees have not been paid, no retraction has appeared, and Le Monde is appealing the judgment.

Court cites French paper for 'racial defamation'

"We cannot allow jurisprudence like this to stand," Catherine Cohen, the attorney representing Le Monde, told the Guardian, a British newspaper.

Immediately after the decision, CRIF, the umbrella group of secular Jewish organizations in France, expressed its satisfaction: "The CRIF has always believed that criticism of Israeli policy falls under the heading of free and democratic debate, but that it must not be expressed through bias or through the demonizing of Israel or the Jewish people."

Outside the Jewish community, reaction to the ruling was surprisingly muted. Journalist Tom Gross noted in the Wall Street Journal on June 2 that though the ruling was a "landmark," it had been all but ignored in France and elsewhere in Europe.

Then, on June 21, Le Figaro came to Le Monde's defence, complaining about the "oversensitivity" of "these types of associations," which seek "to censure the most insignificant article that has the slightest hint of truth to it."

The Jewish press responded indignantly. One writer on the pro-Israel website Primo-Europe.com reminded critics "that in 2002, when the article in question first ran, people were parading in the streets of Paris and other French cities crying 'Death to the Jews!' believing they had a right to do so because of such articles."

On June 17, Morin sat down with the Swiss journalist Sylvia Cattori to speak in his own defence, explaining that he views his writings on the Arab-Israeli conflict as a "diagnostic."

He also pointed to the timing of the article – it appeared in 2002, as Israel went on the offensive against Palestinians in the Jenin refugee camp who had carried out scores of terrorist attacks.

"It was the moment of Jenin, of the greatest repression. From that arose the need to intervene, to bear witness," Morin explained. The article was intended to "sound an alarm."

He protests that the offending passages were taken out of context and that "it is made very clear that it is about the Jews of Israel, not those of [Paris] or Brooklyn, who persecute the Palestinians."

As "L'Affaire Morin," so dubbed by the French press, heats up, Morin's assistant, Catherine Loridan – whose e-mail address was printed at the bottom of an article in Liberation, a left-wing daily, about a petition circulating in defence of Morin and his co-authors – has been receiving hate mail.

"It's the Dreyfus Affair in reverse," Morin complained to Liberation. "It's the Jews who persecute me."

Not everyone is buying that argument.

"French society, or at least its elite, seems no longer to be able to understand the meaning of words, not to mention its own duties and responsibilities," responded Nicole Leibowitz on Proche-Orient.info, a pro-Israel website.

Notable signatories on the pro-Morin petition include postmodernist philosopher Jean Baudrillard, artist Sophie Calle, the editor of the Nouvel Observateur newspaper, and the sociologist Michel Wieviorka, who wrote a recent study of anti-Semitism. Also signing were far-right leaders such as Yvan Aumont and Alain de Benoist.

Several Jewish outlets condemned the petition, saying the signatories acted to preserve friendships in their clique, rather than out of intellectual honesty.

"I would bet that many of those who signed the petition didn't even read Morin's article," Clement Weill-Raynal, president of the Association of Jewish Journalists for the French Press, said on Radio Communaute Juive, a Jewish station. "Some of them no doubt signed out of favouritism, out of ignorance, or out of simple intellectual conformity."

Gilles-Williams Goldnadel, president of France-Israel and Lawyers Without Borders, told Radio J, another Jewish station, that before the trial even began, "these so-called intellectuals tried to explain to us in their learned manner that we are guilty of judicial harassment."

He went on to say that opponents predicted they "would lose the case because it limited freedom of expression."

"If we hadn't followed through with this case," he said, "we would have established a legal precedent in which anything might be possible for some people because of their social position."

Alain Finkielkraut, a celebrated French Jewish philosopher, critiqued the trial in an article in L'Arche magazine in 2004, arguing that no matter what the outcome, "our enemies will interpret it in the same way: as a new proof of the intolerance, the sectarianism, and, let's not be afraid to say it, of the McCarthyism of the Jewish community."

Finkielkraut was right: in her story about the Morin controversy, Sylvia Cattori accused "Jewish militants" of practising "a sort of McCarthyism."

Neither side shows any indication of conceding. For now, Le Monde's appeal remains to be decided, and the debate rages on.

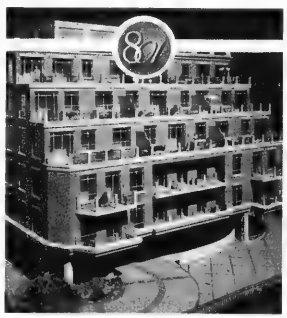
801 Sheppard West
A Downsview Benchmark!

An intimate, boutique condominium with just 37 suites on five floors, 801 Sheppard has just raised the Benchmark Standard for York Central and Downsview. Just steps away from the subway, shopping and places of worship, on the South side of Sheppard, West of Bathurst, 801 Sheppard expects to start construction this summer for a late 2006 occupancy. "It's a Champagne project," says John Blackburn, an associate with P&B Marketing, the company handling sales and promotion for the development company WSFT Development Inc



Blackburn says 801 Sheppard goes beyond anything that is standard in today's market. The spacious one, two and two bedroom with den suites include nine foot ceilings, cornice moldings in living and dining rooms, seven foot main doorways and coffered ceilings in foyers, French doors leading to the balconies and oversized terraces, 5 1/2 inch baseboard hardwood flooring in the living areas and 50 ounce broadloom in all the bedrooms.

The one-bedroom suites start at 620 square feet and $194,900, two-bedroom suites range in size from 900 to 1336 square feet and in price from $245,900 to $439,900. The prices include a parking space as well as a storage locker, monthly maintenance fees are estimated at 29 cents per square foot.

"It is a very elegant, brick and precast concrete building, a traditional building in terms of large space and comfort, but in terms of technology and efficiency, it is the latest" says Blackburn. Using a touch-panel, on the wall, connected to a powerful computer, the residents will have the option to control in-suite security, personal security, lighting, heating and cooling, window treatments and blinds as will as monitor the public spaces and parking. Each suite will have a tank-less hot water system, low E windows, super efficient wall construction, low flush toilets. All ensuites will have imported plumbing fixtures and spa shower stalls complete with steam bath options, as well as radio and telephone hook-ups.

Kitchens will have granite countertops, breakfast bars, track lighting and four stainless steel appliances. Suites include a washer and dryer and will be individually metered for heat, air conditioning and hydro.

Blurry images of Auschwitz toy with the imagination

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

Walking away from Auschwitz, his mind numb from exhaustion after two weeks of photographing one of the world's most evil settings, Daniel Ehrenworth buried his face in hands and sobbed.

"It's just such an overwhelming place," the 27-year-old artist says on the phone in Toronto. In Poland, he shot more than 100 rolls of film for his recent book Holocaust Dream, published by the MacLaren Art Centre in Barrie, Ont.

The book offers, as the introduction says, "The story of a dreamer returning to the site of a personal apocalypse, and seeking the starting point of a new human narrative."

It's a series of black and white photographs that aren't typical clear shots. Instead, they are blurry images that toy with the viewer's imagination and leave you grappling with the meaning.

And meaning is exactly what Ehrenworth is all about. The young artist is quickly carving out a reputation as a deep thinker who looks creatively at his work. He has exhibited at Gallery 44 in Toronto, the Khyber Centre for the Arts in Halifax and the New Gallery in Calgary. His photographs have appeared in Maisonneuve and Hive Magazine.

Ehrenworth, who grew up in Ottawa, said that while other kids might have been dreaming about GI Joe or sports, he was having dreams about the Holocaust.

"Being in that place [Auschwitz] must have been like being in a dream. The physical world remains, but rules of existence are skewed," he says.

Ehrenworth borrowed money, raised money and worked at nightclubs to finance his trip to Poland. He spent two weeks in Auschwitz as part of his fourth-year thesis project at Ryerson University. He would shoot every day from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. with his assistant.

When he returned to Toronto, he started showing the photographs at galleries. He received much praise and soon, much to his surprise, the MacLaren Gallery in Barrie called and a publishing deal was negotiated. The book was released April 20, which, Ehrenworth is quick to point out, is Hitler's birthday.

For his part, Ehrenworth offers a philosophical look at the terrible death camp. Some might see his point of view as controversial. He says he approached Auschwitz with a positive view, as opposed to the traditional negative one. He believes that Auschwitz ended human history, meaning that a new civilization started.

"If Auschwitz exists at one end of the evil spectrum, it means that its exact opposite exists," Ehrenworth says, explaining that he is influenced by Jean-François Lyotard, a leading postmodern thinker. "What Auschwitz truly stands for is a testament for humans to do good."

Ehrenworth says it took him six months to decide on the picture order for Holocaust Dream.

"I would wake up in the middle of the night and arrange the pictures on the walls," he says.

His grandmother is of Ukrainian descent and his grandfather is Austrian. Like most survivors, his grandparents never told him about the Holocaust. He was raised Jewish and still believes in the traditions of the religion but says, "I am not religious and I don't believe in God."

Ehrenworth was recently in Iceland, shooting for a new series called "The Sea of Ending," which will explore the triangular relationship between truth, belief and presence.

"It wasn't a conventional idea. You don't think of Iceland when you think of Judaism [but] Judaism is just ideas," he says.

The UJA and Toronto Jewish Arts Council provided Ehrenworth with a grant for the trip.

Next up?

"Egypt," he says. "I am not quite sure why yet."

DOCUMENTARY FOCUSES ON FREUD AND HITLER IN VIENNA

Toronto filmmaker Manfred Becker examines the philosophies and strange parallels in the lives of two men who shook the 20th century in Neighbours: Freud and Hitler in Vienna. The hour-long documentary, which has aired on the History channel, contains some rare footage of Freud taken by his pupils.

"Each man saw himself as a liberator, and sought to convince others of the incontestable truth of his beliefs," Becker says. "Freud, a Jew, wanted to liberate man from the unconscious – those things that we can't control – to free us from those instincts and desires. Hitler used those very instincts to subjugate people and to 'liberate' the German people from his perceived enemy, the Jews."

A Hugo Award winner for best direction, the film is being screened twice next week at the Camera Bar, 1028 Queen St. W. (west of Ossington Avenue). $10. Sunday, July 24, 7 & 9 p.m. 416-530-0011, www.camerabar.ca.

Names in the News: Toronto writer-poet Anne Michaels, whose first novel Fugitive Pieces (1996) won a huge international readership and many literary prizes, was in London recently, collaborating on an art project with artist John Berger. A reporter from the London Jewish Chronicle found her "instantly warm and approachable" as well as charming because "she hasn't fallen prey to the curse of taking herself too seriously."

Michaels, who let the Holocaust-related themes of Fugitive Pieces marinate in her brain and on the page for more than a decade before her manuscript was published, has been working on a second novel for nearly eight years, she told the Chronicle. "I feel a relationship with the people who read me and a very great responsibility to them to go all the way and, for me, that also means at any moment scrapping what doesn't seem true, not being afraid to begin all over again."

Subject and theme of the work-in-progress? All Michaels would say is that it contains "various historical events and the personal response to them… There's history, there's science, there's engineering, there's architecture. Again, it's drawn on a vast amount of research and detail to try and grasp at a few things that seem true."

Banned in Beirut and Cairo: "What this amounts to is Holocaust denial," Toronto-based film director Norman Jewison told the Toronto Star recently after his 2003 film The Statement, based on the political thriller by Brian Moore about a French Nazi war criminal on the run, was banned in Lebanon and Egypt.

Neither country will allow the film to be shown in theatres or DVD copies to be imported for sale.

Lebanese censorship authorities condemned Jewison for "promoting sympathy for the Jewish cause," while the Egyptians rejected the movie as "Jewish propaganda" that depicted the Jews as victims of persecution. Previous films banned in Beirut include Schindler's List and The Pianist.

The film, which stars Michael Caine, received a positive critical reception but fared poorly at the box office. It relates the story of Paul Touvier, an officer in the Nazi-collaborating Vichy regime who was convicted of the murders of seven Jews. Touvier, aided by right-wing elements in the Catholic Church, spent more than 40 years evading capture in southern France before being apprehended in 1989.

Banned: Michael Caine in The Statement.

Jewish Rock of Ages: Having settled a trademark infringement lawsuit with the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum in Cleveland, the founders of a website celebrating the Jewish contribution to rock music are back in business under the name Jewsrock.org.

The former Jewish Rock and Roll Hall of Fame now offers a renamed "Challah Fame" listing hundreds of Jewish rockers. The site also offers more than a dozen essays on Hebraic rockers under the heading "Shul of Rock" as well as a "Jew or Not?" quiz.

Bob Dylan, Billy Joel, Lou Reed, Carole King, Leonard Cohen, Neil Diamond, Paul Simon, Bruce Springsteen drummer Max Weinberg and Beatles manager Brian Epstein are among the many personalities included in the A-to-Z listing. Each entry presents a snappily written and informative paragraph of biographical details.

The two journalists and the radio- company executive behind the non-profit website agreed to change their site's name to avoid a protracted legal dispute with the Cleveland museum. "These guys are an enormous establishment and institution, and we're just three Jewish guys with a computer," said co-founder Jeffrey Goldberg, who added that the publicity from the lawsuit has generated immense interest in the site.

At the Galleries: "Incognito," a show of works by Ontario artist Lyn Carter, is at the Koffler Gallery, July 14 to Oct. 2. Opening reception, Thursday, July 14, 7 to 9 p.m. with an artist talk at 7 p.m.

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

We've all heard the stories about Russell Crowe. The latest is that he allegedly hit a concierge with a phone in a SoHo hotel, but there've been countless other news reports about his loose fists.

For one Toronto actor, he not only got to see Crowe throw a punch, but he also hung out with him on the set of the recent boxing movie Cinderella Man, and apparently, he's a pretty nice guy.

"At first I was going, 'Oh my god, I know this guy's reputation,' but for some reason Russell took a liking to me," says Judah Katz, 45, one of the few Toronto actors who had a role in the Ron Howard movie.

Katz's positive experiences with Crowe were just beginning. Playing one of the reporters, he spent 30 days working with the star and got to see his craft first hand.

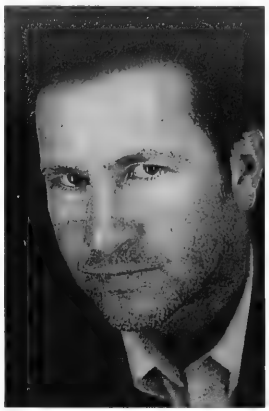
"The two of us clicked professionally," he says. "He's super bright, really a smart guy. He also has a photographic memory. In the boxing scenes Russell not only knew all of his moves for his five fights absolutely perfect, but he knew everyone else's moves too."

While Katz admits that Crowe's perfectionism put some people off, he says the Australian wasn't being callous, he just wanted the best from his co-workers.

"I learned from him to really want the best. He never compromises. In one boxing scene against Max Baer, Russell did it a bunch of times and then stopped and picked up the ring announcer's mike. He talked to the 3,000 extras and told them all 'This scene is about you guys, I need you to make this work.' And he just took over the scene, but really what he was doing was saying 'let's do this the best we can.'"

Getting extras to do their best is one thing, but bringing out perfection in an experienced actor like Katz is another. The Montreal born performer has been acting for 20 years, working alongside James Spader in The Pentagon Papers, Beau Bridges in Out of the Ashes and Holly Hunter in Crash, just to name a few. Katz says Cinderella Man not only brought out the best in him, but was the best film experience he's ever had, in part because he was able to observe one of Hollywood's most prolific directors.

"Ron Howard was an absolute rock. He was extremely focused, doesn't really take part in any of the small talk and he's in work mode from the second he walks in. He would ask me, 'What do you want to do here, what do you want to see here?' and he'd a give a little tweak and I would never hear from him the rest of the day."



Judah Katz

Naturally, Katz thinks one of Howard's best qualities is his eye for talent.

"He hires people he trusts and you can see that all over the place. There was no real reason to hire me for this role, but he wanted experienced actors all around him. It was one less thing for him to worry about."

It was clear from Katz's first meeting with Howard that the director trusted the actor enough to have him land one of the film's more important roles.

"Howard is a very smart man. He really understands how actors work. Instead of saying most of the lead roles have been cast out of the States and now I have to fill everything up with locals, he thought 'I'm gonna give some really meaty audition parts for the big roles to these local actors.' He also made me feel at ease within seconds (of meeting him). Before I even got to him he got out of his chair, gave me a big smile, and shook my hand."

After finding out he was cast as one of the reporters in the film, it was time to research the role, but Katz had never heard of James Braddock, the Depression-era boxer who resurrected his career by knocking out heavyweight champ Max Baer.

"It's a film about family," says the actor who has two kids of his own. "It goes right to your heart. It's during the Depression when they couldn't feed their own children. They didn't have enough money for medicine. It's a heartbreaking story. A lot of people at the time could relate to what was going on with James Braddock, which is why he got the nickname Cinderella Man."

Katz can't help speaking passionately about the movie, as family is as important to him as it was to Braddock. It was his father who encouraged him to pursue his acting dreams and supported his decision to go to acting school.

"My father was my mentor. I would never have been an actor without him. To have the blessing of your father to go into the arts is pretty rare."

So will Katz support his own kids if they catch the acting bug?

"My wife and I always encourage the kids to do whatever they like, but we've discussed that acting professionally, if they would choose to do so, will not happen when they are children."

Correction

'Retired' gallery owner Av Isaacs launches major exhibition

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Justina M. Barnicke Gallery director/curator Judi Schwartz had told retired art dealer and gallery owner Av Isaacs he should consider launching of a major exhibition that would challenge, titillate and capture the mind.

Isaacs, 79 years young, always curious and reaching out, was ready for Schwartz' proposal, and the idea for "Issacs Seen" was conceived.

A risk taker, Isaacs had fostered the controversial, the daring, the experimental, for five decades, but his initial plunge into business came when he was still studying political science and economics at the University of Toronto.

Kitchen Door and Esther* by Christiane Pflug.

Together with fellow U of T student Al Latner, he founded University Framers, geared primarily to diploma holders.

"We did very well on a part-time basis," he notes, "so like fools, we thought it would be a good thing to do. After a year, Al got married and I bought him out for $1,500 in war bonds."

Between 1950 and 2001, Isaacs established an art shop and galleries (including two devoted to Inuit pieces) in Toronto's Yorkville area.

Originally, to make a living, he did framing, carried art supplies and sold reproductions. Artists came for supplies, and feeling comfortable, they became the nucleus of a community – William Ronald, Graham Coughtry, Michael Snow, Joyce Wieland. Critic Robert Fulford also showed an interest.

Isaacs, not yet knowledgeable, somehow instinctively gravitated toward the talented, the searchers. His reputation spread as growing numbers of artists and clients found their way to his galleries. The artists were young Canadians with a nationalistic bent, and Isaacs says, "I encouraged it because I believed that there were a lot of creative people around, but also because of the cultural monster to the south of us. I felt that unless we kept stressing our own, we were going to be overwhelmed."

The galleries are closed now, but Isaacs' response to Schwartz's proposal of a major exhibition was positive. Neither anticipated the scope of what would follow. Among those who came on board were experts in all manner of disciplines – painters, sculptors, poets, musicians, craftsmen and curators offering a profound tribute to a remarkable individual.

"Isaacs Seen" is set in four venues: the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery, the University of Toronto Art Centre, the Textile Museum of Canada and the Art Gallery of Ontario.

"Regarding Av" at Justina M. Barnicke is essentially a private view of Isaacs the collector. A sturdy pair of tailor's scissors perhaps reminds Isaacs of his father's drygoods store. Jackpot Charlie recalls his childhood gambling days in the local cigar shop where the right numbers could yield a prize (this, like in-store slot machines was later banned). A portrait of Isaacs with Pely Bay Inuit artist Agnes Nutuuk, features Isaacs in Arctic garb but sporting quirky red socks. A logo designed for the Isaacs Gallery at Cumberland and Yonge, finely gilded by William Kurelek who had apprenticed as a master gilder, draws attention. Kurelek quietly revealed that he could also paint, and Isaacs showed many of his works.

Two Travellers in a Land Strange and Not So Strange, monumental in size, is a sculpture covered in burrs. Yes, burrs. It's of a man and woman walking along, carrying their shoes, from the concept of Viktor Tiuk.

In contrast are The Water Quilt by Joyce Wieland, a fabric embroidery on loan from the Art Gallery of Ontario, and Wieland's totally different Paint Phantom, a striking oil on loan from the National Gallery in Ottawa.

Smith's favourite is Richard Gorman's Spitfire, oil and acrylic in feel-good yellow with slashes of bright red set off by dark green (Art Gallery of Ontario).

In Kitchen Door and Esther, an oil on canvas by Christiane Pflug, a slight little girl seen from the back sits in the doorway, perhaps just dreaming – of what? Beyond, in front of her, are trees and an open patch of sky (Ottawa's National Gallery).

"Closet Collector" at the Textile Museum of Canada encompasses many facets of needlework and stitchery. Facing the entrance to this section is a portrait of Isaacs actually knit by Martha Black, his former assistant and associate director from about 1970 to 1990. She is now a curator of ethnology, a branch of anthropology that analyzes cultures by relating to their historical development, at the Royal British Columbia Museum.

While Isaacs concentrates on Canadiana, he travels abroad and has brought back beautifully embroidered pieces from Asia, which he has donated to the Textile Museum. "What has captivated me most about textiles is the human touch, the singular personal connection in the hand made object," he says.

"Two on the Scene, Photographs by Michel Lambeth and Tess Taconis" is a limited but telling collection of photographs, which conveys a sense of the era of the Isaacs Gallery in the 1960s and 1970s. Remembered are some of the key personalities associated with the gallery – Joyce Wieland, Dennis Burton, William Kurelek, Michael Snow.

Available for purchase at the Isaacs Seen venues is 50 years on the art front, a gallery scrapbook compiled by Donnalu Wigmore. This is a comprehensive beautifully printed and illustrated volume.

"Regarding Av" continues until Aug. 18 at the Justin M. Barnicke Gallery at Hart House, 7 Hart House Circle, University of Toronto.

"Gallery ReView" continues to Aug. 5 at University of Toronto Art Centre, 15 King's College Circle (416-978-8398).

"Two On the Scene: Photographs by Michel Lambeth and Tess Taconis" continues to Sept. 25 at the Art Gallery of Ontario (416-979-6656).

"The people in the community are especially grateful for our efforts. They have been waiting for this library for over three years."

Rosen said she wanted to incorporate her "Jewish values in an international volunteer experience."

The 22-year-old recently graduated from the University of Victoria and decided to go to Ghana as an extension of her studies.

In June, Rosen and Gilbert attended an orientation session in New York, where they met their American colleagues and prepared for the seven-week stay in Ghana.

On June 24, they met with the elders of Kpeme. The village is a 3½-hour drive from Accra, Ghana's capital.

Project co-leaders Yaniv Snir and Shira Epstein in an online diary on the AJWS website wrote, "We had a meeting with the chiefs… and members of the community under a tree in the village centre. It was a wonderful ceremony during which the chiefs welcomed us into their community… and vowed to take care of us during our stay."

The construction of the library began a few days after the group's arrival.

"In three work days, we have dug the three-foot-deep trenches for laying the cement foundation to the building," wrote Snir and Epstein.

Participants work on the building with members of the community and attend formal learning sessions led by their group leaders.

Rosen said in a recent session they "covered cross-cultural experiences. Other topics include poverty, globalization and sustainable development."

Mike Blasenstein, a spokesperson for AJWS in New York, said the "learning sessions concentrate on issues in development and how Jewish principles can drive compassionate and sustainable change for the world's poor."

Tal Schreier, a Toronto native and Osgoode Hall Law School graduate, received a small stipend and airfare from AJWS for her year-long placement at a legal aid clinic at the University of Cape Town.

"I worked on the Refugee Rights Project, which gives legal advice and support to refugees and asylum seekers in Cape Town," said Schreier, who recently returned to Toronto. "The project aims to help the refugees with their integration needs into South African society."

"We are eating very well – lots of plantain and yams." said Gilbert. "We have a kosher kitchen and a vegan menu."

Kosher vegan menus aside, this summer program is Gilbert and Rosen's tzedekah and personal response to African poverty. Maybe the world's leaders and concert goers could learn something from the activity in this small west African village.

Maccabi golfers to host reception for terror victims

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Maccabiah Games may be a thrilling sports extravaganza, but for the Albert family of Toronto, it also provides the opportunity to do a mitzvah.

Two of the Alberts, father Michael and son David, are competing on Canada's golf team. David's mom, Pam, will accompany the golfing duo to Israel and has arranged an eventful off-course agenda to keep the family busy. In addition to setting up two three-day tours and a team dinner in Caesarea, the site of Israel's lone golf course, she has arranged a reception at the team's hotel for Israeli victims of terror.

The reception will be a joint event held under the auspices of Project Tikvah, the Maccabi World Union's (MWU) special program to rehabilitate victims of terror through sports therapy, and the One Family Fund, an Israeli organization that aids terror victims.

The jointly sponsored evening will allow "athletes to show the victims of terror that Jews in the Diaspora support and want to help them," Pam said. Fifteen Israeli families will participate in the evening along with Canada's golf team: the Alberts, Jeremy Freedman, Howard Ganz, Howard Gold, Steve Goldenberg and his son Jay, and Bradley Sherman.

The Tikvah Project provides athletic activities such as horseback riding and swimming to aid in the physical and psychological recovery of terrorism victims, Pam said.

According to the MWU website, 139 adult and child victims of terror participate in the project, with a waiting list of 400. "Project Tikvah tries to restore victims to a normal life by making funds available to participate in different sports. Our aim is to give them warmth, love and restore their self-worth and confidence," the website states.

The One Family Fund is an Israeli organization that collects money and assembles human resources, including people who have suffered through terror attacks, to volunteer time and money to help families of terror victims, its website said.

One Family Fund provides financial assistance for immediate and long-term needs that government agencies don't provide. It also arranges for volunteers to visit hospitalized victims or houses of mourning.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Should African debt be forgiven? The mitzvah of tzedakah contains a dual component: helping those in need and instilling in the donor the recognition that wealth is a gift from God. Giving money where it is politically correct and popular may make us feel good about ourselves, but it runs the risk of diverting dollars from more worthy causes. We must prioritize our needs, recognizing that we have to balance conflicting goals.

On the one hand Judaism posits that the poor of the local community come first. In practical terms, that means as long as people are dying waiting for medical treatment in Canada, it would be difficult to justify giving large (or perhaps any) sums of foreign aid. Jewish law also states that our first priority in charitable giving is giving food to the hungry, which would seem to indicate that at least some foreign aid to the extremely needy would be mandated – perhaps by diverting spending from "non-essential services" or perhaps designating profits from discretionary spending such as lotteries or "sin" taxes to facilitate such aid.

However, the issue of aid to Africa is much more problematic, owing to the hundreds of billions of dollars that have been squandered on waste and outright corruption. Jewish law forbids giving tzedakah to people whose integrity is questionable – let alone outright cheats – and would bar giving aid to corrupt officials. Under such circumstances, any aid must be given directly to the poor and overseen by people who are free to act with integrity and dignity.

Judaism has always seen charitable giving as a last resort, to be used only when loans and investments are not feasible. Creating a society that is dependent on the largesse of other wealthier nations is a distortion of some of Judaism's deepest values. The optimal approach, which can enable the giving of tzedakah to literally billions of people, would be investment that creates jobs and wealth. This can and may only take place in an open and transparent environment that's free from corruption.

While I see no moral obligation to forgive loans even when dealing with upstanding people (or honest politicians), the granting of interest-free loans is tzedakah in its highest form. Halachah even forbids requesting repayment of a loan when the debtor legitimately has no means of repayment.

Thus, the cornerstone of foreign aid would be a combination of investment, interest forgiveness and liberal loan repayment criteria, where applicable.

SWEET DREAMS SOUP

1 small potato, peeled, chopped	1/8 tsp. nutmeg
2 tblsp. butter	1/4 tsp. salt
1 small leek, chopped	1/2 tsp. pepper
2 large carrots, finely chopped	1/2 stalk celery, chopped
1/2 tsp. grated fresh ginger	2 1/2 cups milk
1/4 tsp. thyme	Garnish: carrot curls and croutons

Boil potato in 2 cups water for 15 mins. Drain; save broth; set the potato aside. Melt butter in a soup pot on medium heat. Add leek, half the carrots, ginger, thyme, nutmeg, salt, pepper. Sauté 5 mins., stirring well. Add celery, remaining carrots, cooked potato; potato broth. Add 1 cup water and stir.

Bring to a boil; reduce heat; simmer, covered, about 20 mins. Blend 2 cups soup with milk until thick and smooth. Return the blended soup to the soup pot, and stir.

Jews through the eyes of a mailman

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Strangely, I can see you better in some ways than you can see yourself. Physically, this is the case because you are restricted by the dimensional limits of the mirror or the silent lake that reflects your image, unlike my eyes that see you three-dimensionally.

Your character – your way – also appears differently through my judgment than yours. I have the advantage of objectively scrutinizing your outward behaviour, sometimes mixed in with an understanding of your insides, giving me a type of insight unavailable to you.

This, too, is the case with a community, in our case the Toronto Jewish community. Its members define it of course, but it is also characterized by its non-Jewish neighbours, business associates, sociologists and documentarians.

And then there are the mail carriers. How do the carriers whose routes fall within the Jewish corridor see us? After all, are they not privy to intimate details of our lives, such as the origin of our investment statements, our subscriptions and postcards from our children in camp? Surely these frequent messengers have a distinct awareness of our people.

Well, recently I had a beer with one such individual at the Lazy Lizard Pub. John has been delivering mail for 24 years, 20 years in the Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street area, a Jewish crossroads with a large haredi population.

John's an intriguing character. His friend tells me he is a member of Mensa, a society for people whose IQ is in the top two per cent of the population. His right shoulder kind of droops, a condition he says in an occupational hazard stemming from years of delivering hoards of High Holy Day greetings, Chanukah cards, The CJN and heavy parcels wrapped in thick brownish-grey paper with postage from Israel. John's experience tells him they are likely "holy books."

The wind-blown postman, a son of a doctor, expresses deep admiration for the Jewish people on his old route. He says they are "very kind folk" (with the occasional curmudgeon on Caribou Road and Stormount Avenue) with sincere interest in his welfare.

He sips his suds and tells me a story – one with an Isaac Bashevis Singer flavour – of a "charming" old devout woman whom he delivered mail to for two decades. Staring skyward, John reminisces about her and says she was "as lovely as could be… gracious and generous."

He said she would always give him gifts when the holiday season came around, once tipping him $100 and once giving him an "exquisite" serving tray she purchased for him while visiting Jerusalem. I imagined a rainy Monday morning when she invited him in for a cup of coffee.

John's eyes teared as he told me he mourned deeply after her passing. I was intrigued by his heartfelt nature and the significant human interaction that occurs while we're not looking. I wondered what the aged woman's bank teller felt (individuals often compassionately connected to their geriatric customers) when she heard she died.

John liked the younger people on his route too, especially the children, curious about his job and the world outside of their own. His beer mug remained in his hand, but still on the table as he recounted an ordinary morning, when a 10-year-old boy "with strings hanging out" asked him, "John, why does the whole world want to kill the Jews?" John replied sadly that he didn't know.

According to this veteran mail carrier, the Jewish people at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue receive a relatively large amount of mail. John says the people are mostly amiable, inquisitive and giving.

Our Jewish community. Who are we? The answer, at least in part, lies in the minds of the cleaning lady, the grocer, the hairstylist, and no doubt – the mailman.

'Welcome home, to the Holy Land'

Israpet and Benji Feldman photos

North American olim set one-day record

Some 200 Canadians were among 500 people to arrive in Israel last Wednesday, July 13, in the largest ever, single-day aliyah of North American Jews to Israel.

Two flights, sponsored by Nefesh B'Nefesh and the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), left Tuesday afternoon from New York and Toronto. They were the first of six charters this year carrying 3,200 North American olim through these organizations.

This is the first year since 1983 that more than 3,000 North Americans will make aliyah, and it was the first time a planeload left from Canada.

The new olim were met at Ben-Gurion Airport in Israel by Prime Minster Ariel Sharon, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres and JAFI chairman Zeev Bielski.

"Aliyah is the primary goal of our government, the future of our great people. Life in Israel is not always easy, but I promise you we will do all we can to assist you on your journey home," Sharon told the olim.

"We need you more than ever," he said. "Welcome home, to the Holy Land."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Downtown Revival

VANCOUVER — An initiative sponsored by the National Council of Jewish Women and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver hopes to open a community centre in downtown Vancouver to meet a growing demand for services from the increasing number of Jews in the area, the Western Jewish Bulletin reported this month. When the 2001 census came out, community planners were surprised to learn that 1,200 Jews lived downtown, and current estimates say about 2,000 Jews now live there, out of about 22,000 Jews in the Vancouver area. The Downtown Jewish Community Centre Project attracted more than 70 people to its inaugural event, a Passover seder in April, and got a healthy turnout for a Shavout picnic, organizers said.

WORLD

Synagogue Reopens

CAIRO — A Cairo synagogue built in 1934 was slated to open last week for the first time in many years. Ha'aretz reported that the head of Cairo's Jewish community, Carmen Weinstein, and Israel's ambassador to Egypt, Shalom Cohen, arranged to reopen the synagogue, which had been closed because so few Jews remain in Egypt. Cohen said the Israeli Embassy will help to maintain the synagogue.

Sapling Planted

CHICAGO — A rare sapling grown from a maple tree planted by children in the Theresienstadt camp was to be planted in Chicago this week in a special ceremony at the Chicago Botanic Garden. The seed for the tree was given by a sympathetic camp guard to Irma Lauscher, a teacher in the concentration camp who held secret classes for children.

Art Centre Opens

OXFORD — A multimillion-dollar centre for Middle Eastern art opened at Oxford University, with money from a British Jewish philanthropist. Iranian-born professor David Khalili pledged about $4.8 million (Cdn) to create the Khalili Research Centre for the Art and Material Culture of the Middle East. The complex opened this month in the heart of the university and is intended to become the world's most comprehensive centre for the study of visual cultures of the Middle East. Khalili, an art collector and scholar, is co-founder and chair of the Maimonides Foundation, which promotes dialogue between Jews and Muslims.

Newspaper Fined

VILNIUS — Lithuania's leading national daily newspaper Respublika was fined the equivalent of $1,000 (US) for printing an anti-Semitic article last year. The July 7 decision is seen as a victory for the local Jewish community, which took the influential newspaper's owner, Vitas Tomkus, to court. He was found guilty of inciting ethnic and religious hatred for an article with the headline "Who rules the world" and a picture of a Jew holding a globe. Simonas Alperavicius, the leader of Lithuania's 5,000 Jews, called it the "worst attack on the Jewish community since Lithuania's independence" from the Soviet Union 15 years ago. Tomkus would not apologize and said he would appeal.

Sharon Visit Protested

PARIS — Demonstrators in Paris protested Ariel Sharon's July 27 official visit to France. Sources estimated the turnout earlier this month against the Israeli prime minister to be about 2,000 people, a low number that some attributed to the fact many Parisians go on vacation in the summer. According to a statement from protest organizers, who call themselves the Collective Against the Visit of Sharon to France, President Jacques Chirac's decision to invite "the butcher Sharon" to France "is to insult all those who refuse colonial violence."

Vacationing Israeli Treated London Victims

Benny Meilik, an emergency surgeon and consultant at Tel Aviv Medical Center, was eating breakfast with his family at a hotel in the British capital July 7 when he heard the blast that tore through the London Underground's Piccadilly Line. "I have heard enough explosions to know what they sound like, and when I heard the boom I sprang into action," the Jerusalem Post quoted him as saying later.

Dr. Benny Meilik

Accustomed to working with victims of Palestinian terror attacks, Meilik helped pull out and treat casualties of the bombing, one of four that tore through London's public transportation system that day, killing at least 50 people.

"I have worked on many, many victims of bomb attacks, and I can say this is as bad as any I have seen. I have a lot of experience in treating blast victims, and this bomb was powerful," Meilik said. One of the commuters he treated praised the "Israeli hero" in remarks to reporters.

MONTREAL — The future of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), launched at the beginning of 2004 as a kind of superstructure to the community's existing public advocacy organizations, is about to be reviewed.

"It will undergo a complete re-evaluation, an independent evaluation, in the fall, with a report due by the end of the year," said Stanley Plotnick, the new president of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC).

"Intuitively, I think [CIJA] is working well. We see some changes taking place. We are explaining ourselves better to non-Jews, but whether this is cause-and-effect, we can't really say."

Plotnick said it was not yet decided who would conduct the evaluation. He added that when the Toronto-based CIJA was founded, it was understood that it would be reviewed within 18 to 24 months.

Plotnick agreed that the existence of CIJA may have created confusion in the public's mind over its role in relation to the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the organizations it oversees. CIJA also supports the National Committee for Jewish Campus Life.

"But I can tell you there was confusion for many years before about what the CIC does and what CJC does," he said. "CIJA is an attempt to define the roles of the CIC and CJC, to make sure that each knows what the other is doing."

While its effectiveness may be debated, Plotnick said, he is confident that CIJA is efficient and is not just another layer of bureaucracy.

"Total administrative costs are now less because of centralization. There is one accounting office today instead of three, for example."

CIJA was created as a separate body by UIAFC, in concert with a group of leading businessmen, who wanted to increase the Canadian government and public's support for Israel and issues of Jewish concern by taking a more sophisticated strategic approach. CIJA was to streamline and co-ordinate the community's advocacy efforts and mobilize broad-based action.

Substantial additional financial and human resources were allocated. Hershell Ezrin, a former diplomat, political adviser and public policy expert, is CIJA's chief executive officer.

Plotnick, who succeeds Shoel Silver of Toronto, stressed that strengthening the "partnership" between Canadian Jewry and Israel is one of the main goals of his two-year term.

"The ties between Jewish Canadians and Jewish Israelis have to be continuously reinforced. When there is a crisis, everyone jumps in to help, but at other times, it's a diminished priority."

Canadian Jewry's support of Israel should not only be monetary; the community has a responsibility, he thinks, to explain Israel's position and policies to government and opinion-makers.

Plotnick, a past president of Montreal's FEDERATION CJA, firmly believes that Israel is "the primary identification of the Jewish people," and how Israel fares is directly linked to how Jews everywhere are regarded.

However, he also believes in maintaining a strong Jewish life in the Diaspora, although he feels the number of countries where that is possible is declining.

"The success of Israel is important to the success of Jewish communities in the world... It reflects back on us... There is no contradiction in supporting a strong Israel and a strong Diaspora."

Within Canada, Plotnick is committed to maintaining and bolstering small Jewish communities. He'll visit Halifax in August to meet leaders of the Atlantic Jewish Council, and over the next six months, he will try to get to all of the member communities from coast-to-coast.

"I want to see what they need and if we can help them. I believe it is the responsibility of the large communities to support the smaller communities," he said. Keeping young people in the smaller communities and grooming them as future leaders is a big part of his goal.

Going for your dreams at Stratford

From the editor's desk

Last month in this space I wrote about two exciting young artists – Jennifer Waiser and Gabriel Wolinsky – both from Ottawa who are part of the company of actors and dancers at the Stratford Festival this year. Two other actors, both appearing on Stratford's stage for the first time, merit our attention as well.

The 40-ish Evan Stillwater is a veteran of the theatre. In fact, this is his 11th season at Stratford. But it is his first on stage. For the past decade, he has been a tailor, a cutter of costumes in Stratford's wardrobe department. His work in the wardrobe room, however, has been the colourful and creative filling in a stage and theatre career sandwich.

Well before Evan picked up the tailor's scissors and thread, he was an actor, a graduate of both the National Theatre School of Canada and the Bristol Old Vic Theatre School in the United Kingdom.

The youngest of three brothers, the Winnipeg-born Stillwater went to Ramah Hebrew School until Grade 7 and then to public school in Grade 8. In his conversation with The CJN, he spoke constantly with cheerful authority and recurring expressions of gratitude. "I was very fortunate to have auditioned for [writer, producer and director] Richard Ouzounian at the end of my studies with the National Theatre School," he said.

Evan Stillwater

The legendary Ouzounian granted the emerging thespian a full year's apprenticeship at the Manitoba Theatre Centre in Winnipeg. After Manitoba, Stillwater said he "flitted" around the country in various stage roles, trying to hone his still embryonic skills. He felt a strong need to gain more experience, to perfect his talents. Thus he went to England, where he enrolled in the Bristol Old Vic Theatre School.

"I was very lucky to have met and studied with the people whose paths crossed mine," Stillwater said. "It felt kind of bashert. It all happened the way that I guess it should have. Studying in the U.K. was a great way to get the tools you need to go on the road."

And Stillwater has spent a lot of time "on the road" with theatre companies across the country, including in Winnipeg, Banff, Calgary, Toronto, Montreal and Halifax.

After his stint studying and working in Britain, Stillwater returned to Canada, where he won the key part of Reuben Calish in the film The Outside Chance of Maximillian Glick. Despite the success of his performance, the young actor still needed to secure an income in the highly competitive though restricted Canadian theatre market. And it was not always easy. Thus, rather than waiting on tables like so many aspiring actors of his and every generation, Stillwater decided to help out in the wardrobe department at the Theatre Centre in Winnipeg.

Sammy Rosen

It was a mature and inspired decision. He learned to live in the rarified wardrobe department of theatre companies, to cut, sew and create costume patterns, and to master the highly specialized behind-the-stage wardrobe needs of his fellow actors. But he could not yet surrender his desire to return to the front of the stage. Thus he put down his needle, thread and scissors after last season and enrolled in the Stratford Festival's Birmingham Conservatory for Classical Theatre Training.

It takes a great deal of courage and determination for someone to test himself that way in mid-life, suddenly alongside peers and classmates who are much younger. But he passed the test and this year, the eclectic Stillwater picks up actor's greasepaint rather than thimble and thread. He performs in The Brothers Karamazov.

If Evan Stillwater's career is a testament to diverse skills, wide-ranging theatrical talent and veteran resolve, the still-climbing trajectory of Sammy Rosen's nascent career is a testament to precocious talent and youthful zest.

At the age of 19, Sammy Rosen is the youngest member of the company. Born in Thornhill, the gung-ho, effervescent teenager has already been dancing for 13 years. He moves smoothly through ballet, tap, jazz and even acrobatics.

Rosen studied dance at Vlad Dance Co. and eventually graduated from the Arts York program at Unionville High School. After he graduated high school, he worked for a year and then won Stratford roles in The Tempest and in Hello Dolly. "It was a shock to learn that I actually got the job," Rosen said.

He told The CJN that his parents have always been supportive of his theatre aspirations and today he "couldn't be happier. There are so many people here who inspire you and make you want to go to work every day. It is a blessing to be working here, learning from everybody. It is simply incredible to watch the people here."

Not surprisingly, the young dancer has a rigorous regimen to keep himself fit and trim and ready for the onerous physical demands of his roles. He spends a great deal of time at the gym, and is careful about what and when he eats.

What advice does he offer to other teenagers trying to make it in theatre?

"If you want it, go for it." Don't let the naysayers wear you down, he says "Go to the next job. Take the criticism. Going for your dreams is something you should never put aside." — MBD

WOULD-BE SAILORS LEARN FROM THE BEST

Former U.S. Olympian swimmer Mark Spitz, who broke several world records and won nine gold medals in the 1968 and 1972 Olympics, was in Israel for the 17th Maccabiah Games. Last week, he went to the Tel Aviv marina to sail with a group of youngsters, some of whom were victims of terrorism.

Israelis cope well with terrorism, sociologist says

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Terrorism is a useless tool for changing people's behaviour and "has hardly any effect on anything," an Israeli sociologist told the World Conference on Disaster Management last week in Toronto.

Alan Kirschenbaum, a professor at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, was presenting a study based on information gathered from 800 Israeli households. It showed that people simply learn to live with recurring catastrophes such as suicide bombings or hurricanes.

"[Israelis] adapted in such a way that it practically didn't change their lifestyle. On average, when there is a suicide bombing of a bus or a restaurant, two hours later you'd never know anything was there," Kirschenbaum told the 15th annual conference, held July 10 to 13 at the Toronto Metro Convention Centre.

According to Kirschenbaum's study, more than 65 per cent of Israelis report having a family member or friend who has been hurt or killed by an act of terrorism.

"We're talking about a massive number of people that have been affected by terrorism. You'd think they'd be running home to put a quilt over their heads and hide. But it doesn't work that way," he said.

People adapt by becoming better informed, by making sure their friends are OK, by becoming more aware of suspicious people, and by turning to God, he said.

"As they say, praise the Lord and pass the ammunition."

Kirschenbaum's hope is that terrorists will see that they are wasting their time, because people get used to the idea of "preparing themselves for the next blast."

He added: "Adaptation is an integral part of social resilience. We [humans] have the capacity to be resilient. If we didn't, we wouldn't be here.

"Eventually, terror, like natural and technological disasters, will have less and less of an impact on our daily behaviour. The secret of our survival is behavioural adaptation, and we do it very well."

The conference, organized by the non-profit Canadian Centre for Emergency Preparedness, bills itself as the only North American event of its kind that attracts world experts to discuss "the full spectrum of disaster management issues," including how to prepare for major incidents such as wide-scale blackouts, SARS or tsunamis.

In addition to Kirschenbaum, Israel was represented by Ruth Geva, the project co-ordinator with the Jerusalem Association of Community Centres and Councils, and by an exhibit showcasing the IsoArk, an isolation chamber developed by Beth-El Zikhron Yaaqov Industries, Israel's leading supplier of biological, chemical and nuclear protection technologies.

Hank Helleman, of Collective Protection Engineering Inc., a Beth-El subsidiary that markets the IsoArk, said the collapsible isolation chamber can quickly turn a room into a controlled environment in the event of an emergency.

"[It] can be used... when you have too many people coming into a place, especially like a hospital, when there is a threat like SARS, avian flu, or a biological or chemical attack," Helleman said.

"When someone is infected with something, we can isolate it."

The IsoArk's air filtration system exceeds the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention guidelines for isolation rooms, he added.

Ahenakew stripped of Order of Canada medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson last week accepted the recommendation of the Advisory Council of the Order of Canada and revoked David Ahenakew's membership in the order.

The move came days after a provincial court judge in Saskatchewan found the former native leader guilty of promoting hatred against Jews. Ahenakew, who served as chief of the Assembly of First Nations (AFN), was convicted for calling Jews a disease and saying Adolf Hitler was right to kill six million Jews in the Holocaust. Ahenakew was ordered to pay a $1,000 fine.

In a news conference following his conviction, a defiant Ahenakew said he would appeal the verdict. He also said he would not voluntarily give up his membership in the order and he blamed Jewish groups for lobbying to have his membership revoked.

Canadian Press reported that the Governor General's office will give Ahenakew some time to return his Order of Canada medal before it determines how best to remove it from him.

The advisory council began the formal revocation process at its regularly scheduled semi-annual meeting on June 29.

In a news release, the council stated, "Irrespective of the outcome of the legal proceedings involving Mr. Ahenakew, the council considers that his actions have brought disrepute to the order."

Ahenakew was appointed a member of the Order of Canada on Dec. 18, 1978.

Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said stripping Ahenakew of his membership "is quite appropriate. An Order of Canada is not a right, it's an honour."

Ahenakew, he continued, "is not the kind of person we should be honouring in this way."

Of the 4,000 people named to the Order of Canada, only one other person has lost his or her membership. In 1998, Alan Eagleson, former head of the NHL Players Association, was stripped of the honour after he was convicted of fraud.

Blacks in Darfur experiencing 'African Auschwitz'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the deserts of western Sudan, an estimated 2.5 million to three million black Muslims are eking out a miserable existence in refugee camps a Toronto doctor calls an "African Auschwitz."

Surrounded by "genocidaires," murderous militiamen drawn from the country's Arab Muslim population, they fear to leave the camps. Only the elderly venture outside to forage for food and firewood. Young men who do so are murdered, women raped. The very old stand a chance of being left alone by the "janjaweed" militiamen, who act with the support of the government in Khartoum.

Dr. Norman Epstein, founder of C.A.S.T.S. (Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan), said Black Muslims in Darfur are dying at the rate of 10,000 to 20,000 a month thanks to a genocidal policy perpetrated by the Khartoum-backed janjaweed. And while the United States has labeled the atrocities "genocide," the U.S. government, the United Nations, European states and the Arab League have done little to put an end to it.

"Political expediency" in many world capitals is trumping any humanitarian impulses that could save Darfur refugees. And the western world's invocation of the phrase "never again," to refer to the prevention of genocide, rings hollow, he added.

"I think 'never again' is a euphemism for international quiet," he said. "It's just become a way of releasing guilt."

Epstein believes it is up to middle powers to take the lead in alleviating the suffering of Darfur refugees. Canada, for its part, is leading an international effort to intervene to aid small detachments of African Union (AU) troops already on the ground who could protect the camps.

The AU, a coalition of African states, has sent 3,000 troops to guard the refugee camps, but the force is inadequate and it does not have the equipment, communications and logistics support it requires. Senator Roméo Dallaire, who as a Canadian general headed the UN peacekeeping force in Rwanda during the 1994 genocide there, is leading a task force attempting to support and reinforce the AU soldiers in Darfur, Epstein said.

Despite Canada's efforts and the wide publicity given to the fate of Darfur's black Muslim population, relief efforts "are going on way too slowly."

The United Nations is paralyzed by the competing interests of its Security Council members. China gets five to 10 per cent of its oil from Sudan and is looking to ramp that up; Russia sells its surplus military equipment to Sudan while the United States is overstretched militarily and has a working intelligence-gathering arrangement with Sudan, Epstein said.

The Arab League defends Sudan at [UN] General Assembly "at every turn" and European states see no strategic interest in Darfur. That has bred an apathetic reaction.

"It really comes down to the unfortunate reality that strategic interests trump humanitarian interests," Epstein said.

While the problem in the western Sudan continues, immediate relief could be provided 414 Sudanese trapped in Iraq, Epstein said. Unable to safely return to Sudan and with their work visas expired, they are in a sort of limbo. They are suspected of being terrorists and they have been harassed by the Iraqi government. Criminal elements have attacked and kidnapped them.

Epstein would like to see Canada admit them as refugees, just as it did Kosovans during the conflict there.

Epstein said one group that has stepped to the plate in the last year is the Canadian Jewish community. It has taken to heart the meaning behind "never again" and has worked hard for the Darfur victims of genocide. Epstein lauded Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the Simon Wiesenthal Center and Reform Jewish organizations for joining other lobby groups to press the Canadian government to use its resources to intervene.

Epstein said despite lack of progress by the international community, "I am cautiously hopeful that with Canada taking leadership...that these people might get some help. But I'm still very concerned."

Attacking Israelis, but wounding Abbas

Inspired, perhaps, by the mourning and the sorrow following the incineration of some 53 innocent people in London a few days before, the radically violent Islamic Jihad in Tulkarm let loose its own terror on Netanya last week and killed five Israelis. Two days later, as if part of a macabre, blood-letting competition among murderers, Hamas and Al Aksa launched a rocket attack against Nativ Ha'asara, a community within the Green Line (the boundaries before the Six Day War) just north of Gaza, which killed another Israeli.

It took very little time for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to spring into action against the terror groups, sending the army into Tulkarm to find the planners and masterminds of the Netanya bombing and to attack a number of Hamas installations in the Gaza Strip. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, however, was very slow to respond. He referred to the Netanya bombing perpetrators as "idiots." His indignation, though, seemed linked more to expedience rather than revulsion for and condemnation of violence. He emphasized that "only those directly linked to the [Netanya] attack would be punished."

With disengagement over the next horizon, and Palestinian elections not far behind, Islamic Jihad and Hamas are fighting with Abbas for control of the Palestinian agenda as well as the property that will soon be vacated. It was not surprising therefore that Palestinian police clashed with Hamas forces when Abbas went to Gaza last Thursday to attempt to cajole or plead with Hamas and Islamic Jihad leaders into abiding by his rules, at least until the disengagement from Gaza by Israel is complete.

Abbas declared a state of emergency in Gaza on Thursday night, after dozens of Hamas gunmen stormed two Palestinian police posts in the northern Gaza Strip. But Abbas will have to declare much more than a temporary state of emergency against the fundamentalist, Iranian-backed rejectionists who lead the campaign against Israel, and, truth be told, him. He will have to declare war on them.

But he is unwilling. And thus, the central irony of last week's violence against Israel remains unresolved: when the Palestinian terrorists attack Israel, they wound Abbas and the economic prospects for a future Palestinian state. Neither the Group of 8, nor the U.S. Congress, nor Canada, will be eager to give foreign aid to a lawless society, which is what Palestinian society will surely become if Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aksa Martyrs wrest control of Palestinian society away from the tentative Abbas.

25 years ago in The CJN

- As the Knesset debated formally declaring Jerusalem Israel's capital, Arab delegates to the United Nations called for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories and for Israel to agree to the establishment of a Palestinian state.
- The opening of the Moscow Olympics was marked in Ottawa by a student vigil and rally. Petitions demanded the release of Jewish and Soviet prisoners of conscience.
- Canadian Jewish Congress asked secretary of state Francis Fox to delete "la croix" ("the cross") from the French version of O Canada.

London terrorism is no shock

England has been a centre for promoting Islamic violence against the western world for at least two years ('A sense of shocked disbelief,' CJN, July 14). In that time, little action was taken to discourage hatemongers, as it was thought that appeasement would save England from terrorism. It didn't.

This spreading and promoting of hate and violence inevitably resulted in the bombings in London. It should have been no surprise. It should have shocked no one.

We in Canada have followed a similar weak-kneed policy in dealing with terrorist cells, immigration, and those promoting violence and anti-western feeling. I hope there will not be more "shocked disbelief" from our community as we have been amply warned of the future results of a do-nothing policy.

Truth in journalism

There is no arguing with your demand for high standards of truth in journalism ("Trust is essential," CJN, July 7). The actions of parachuted Globe and Mail freelancer Carolynne Wheeler in deliberately filing a false report as to the locale and other details about a summit meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas are reprehensible, as was the attempt to defend her by a tissue of more lies by Globe editor Guy Nicholson.

And yet, in the greater scheme of things, that objective journalism is often the exception rather than the rule.

We need more Jewish babies

I was saddened, yet not surprised to see your June 30 article chronicling the stagnation of the Canadian Jewish population ("Immigrants account for small rise in Jewish population," study finds).

The Jewish community of Canada has experienced negligible growth rates, even as it has welcomed tens of thousands of immigrants. The Jewish communities in the United States, Israel, and throughout the world are experiencing similar hardships.

Where are the communal Jewish organizations in fighting this ominous tide? What steps are being taken to reverse this trend? Have any Jewish leaders taken an interest in the future of their community, or have they resigned themselves to dwindling numbers?

The Jewish community in Canada and elsewhere is doomed to shrink further until it is understood that higher birth rates in the Jewish community are the only way to ensure growing numbers.

Jewish education alone is a misleading placebo in the battle for Jewish continuity. The only guarantee is more Jewish babies. Period.

Winnipeg's Jewish museum's funding

I was struck by two headlines, "Winnipeg Jewish museum facing cash crunch" and "JNF Negev galas raise $1.4M out West." (CJN, June 30).

Why does the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg determine that of all its beneficiary agencies, only the Jewish Heritage Centre (JHC) and its museum must be seriously cut back because of other community priorities?

A museum was included in the construction of Winnipeg's Asper Jewish Community Campus as a condition for obtaining a capital grant from the federal government. But from the outset, Winnipeg's federation and campus leadership failed to make proper provisions for ongoing funding of the museum.

Federation keeps reducing its allocation to the museum, while the campus board increases its rent. If the museum and the JHC are not a Jewish community responsibility, whose responsibility are they?

Says play equates Israel with Nazis

Liliane Atlan, in her play Les Mers Rouges, which was recently presented at Toronto's Fringe Festival, has turned the tale of her family's struggle to survive during and after the Holocaust into a "moral equivalence" propaganda piece ("Sephardi love songs featured in Holocaust survival play," CJN, July 7).

It is during a dialogue about Israel's war with Lebanon that the play takes a turn for the worse. According to the play, Israel sent its young boys to Lebanon in 1982 to have their tanks destroy Arab homes and to enter refugee camps to harm little children, and the play emphasizes that the Israeli soldiers "liked it." The moral equivalence of Israel becoming the Nazis to their neighbours is almost impossible to miss.

Talk about theatre that makes you sit up and take notice. One moment the audience is asked to feel the pain of the murdered six million, and the next we are asked to applaud a performance morally equating Israel with the Nazis.

How indecent of Atlan to smear the memory of the Holocaust victims, her family included, just to try and stick a knife in the back of Israel.

To find any moral equivalence between the Nazi Holocaust and the soldiers who fought, fight and died to keep Israel safe from terrorism is abhorrent. This play deserves to be boycotted by all who abhor the Nazi ideology and cherish the memory of the victims of the Holocaust.

Remembering Canada's Yiddish poets

By SIMCHA SIMCHOVITCH

When I arrived in Montreal in the summer of 1949, I found a lively environment of Yiddish speakers, writers, teachers and admirers of Yiddish literature.

The Kanader Adler, published by Hirsh Wolofsky and edited by Israel Rabinovitch, was still appearing as a daily Yiddish newspaper, as it had since 1907, and the Jewish Public Library, in its old location on Esplanade Street, was a hub of Yiddish cultural activities. There were two day-schools where Yiddish language and literature were taught, the Peretz Shule under the direction of the distinguished educator and Yiddish writer Yakov Zipper and the Folkshule with the Yiddish and Hebrew scholar Shlomo Weisman at its head.

Simcha Simchovitch

After working in a leather shop for my first two years in the city, I was admitted to the United Jewish Teachers Seminary of Montreal, where I studied, full-time for three years, Yiddish literature from such outstanding teachers and scholars as Yechiel Stern (brother of Yaakov Zipper) and Shimshon Dunsky. My first collection of Yiddish poems (published in 1950) led me to join the Association of Yiddish Writers of Montreal.

In my 1990 book Blendiker Horbst, I included a narrative poem titled Canadian Yiddish Poets, in which I listed 22 poets and related something about each of them.

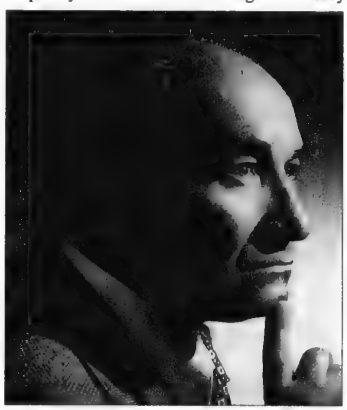
First among that group were three internationally known Yiddish poets: Itzhak-Yakov Sigal, Melech Ravitch and Rachel Korn.

Sigal arrived in Montreal at age 15 and worked for many years as an operator in a tailor shop. Later, he was a teacher in one of the Yiddish afternoon schools, and afterward, till the end of his life in 1954, he was literary editor of the Kanader Adler.

Sigal was a very prolific writer. His poems, articles and essays appeared steadily in the Kanader Adler and many other Yiddish periodicals, and he authored 10 thick volumes of Yiddish poetry. Yakov Glatstein, the eminent Yiddish poet and critic, considered Sigal's 1950 book Sefer Yiddish to be a monumental work of Yiddish lyrical poetry.

Ravitch was already widely known in Poland as an avant garde poet, travel writer and secretary of the Warsaw Union of Yiddish Writers. He arrived in Montreal in 1941, and he became the head of the public lectures program, called Folks-Universitet, of the Jewish Public Library. Ravitch was also a prolific writer, publishing poetry, as well as essays and book reviews, in Yiddish papers all over the world. Ravitch lived a Spartan life. He was a vegetarian and an admirer of Baruch Spinoza. He urgently preached the creativity of a new "bible" – a sanctioned anthology of the best of Jewish writing from the last 1,000 years. In one of his last books, The Crowning, he envisioned the arrival of a new American- or Canadian-born poet who would carry the torch for Yiddish poetry on this continent.

The third luminary was Korn. She, too, was already known in Poland before the war as the author of mature poetry and stories about the life of Jewish village dwellers. Korn's book of collected poems, Home and Homelessness, published in 1948, was greeted as a major contribution to post-Holocaust Yiddish literature.



Peretz Miransky

There were also a number of Yiddish poets who came to live in Montreal before and in the years after World War I. Among them was the poet Ida Maze, who was held in high esteem both as a lyrical and children's poet and for giving assistance to Jewish immigrants, especially the Yiddish writers who arrived after World War II.

Beside her, there were a number of less prominent poets: Esther Segal (sister of J.I. Segal) and her husband Abraham Shkolnikov, Mirel Shatan and Shabetai Perl, and the Peretz School teacher and Yiddish scholar Moshe Shaffer.

First among that group were three internationally known Yiddish poets: Itzhak-Yakov Sigal, Melech Ravitch and Rachel Korn

In 1930, poet Noach Gotlieb arrived from Kovno. The author of 10 books of poetry, Gotlieb was a short, sickly man, poor and gentle. He was supported by his wife, who peddled his books all over the city.

Aside from the poets associated with the Montreal writer's union, was the "proletarian" poet Sholem Shtern, whose poetic novels and narratives (The White House, The Family in Canada) about the life of Jewish immigrants in Montreal were translated into English and French. Sholem's brother, Yiddish teacher Israel Shtern was the opposite of his brother, a romantic and mystic poet steeped in Kabbalah and classical English literature.

In Toronto, there was also a group of Yiddish poets associated with the Communist-leaning United Jewish People's Order. Abraham Nisnewitch published his lyrical and social poems in the Toronto Wochenblat and other left-wing publications. Shimon Nepam, author of several books of revolutionary poetry, worked for many years as a streetcar conductor with the TTC; and Yudika Zik, a very talented lyrical poet, was a seamstress at the Tip Top Tailors factory.

After World War II, a new group of Yiddish writers arrived in Montreal and Toronto. They had survived of the German death camps or fled to the Soviet Union. Among them were poets Chava Rosenfarb, Peretz Miransky, Yitzhak Goldkron, Joseph Rogel, Shlomo Mitzmacher and myself. All of us contributed according to our talents to enriching the treasury of Canadian Yiddish poetry.

After publishing several books of poetry, Rosenfarb became a renowned prose writer, author of several novels on the destruction of the Lodz Ghetto and the martyrdom in Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Rogel's poetry, in Yiddish and English, was permeated with the pain of losing his kin in the Holocaust. In addition to being a fine lyrical poet, Miransky became known for his masterful fables, and both Goldkorn and Mitzmacher produced, besides poetry, essays on Jewish books and writers.

Poet Mordechai Husid was proficient in both Yiddish and Hebrew and authored several books of short stories. He was the last editor of the Kanader Adler, when it became a weekly, and his demise coincided with the end of this Canadian Yiddish tribune.

All in all, I mentioned in my memorial poem 22 names of Canadian Yiddish poets. However, there were a few more poets I left out who are worthy of being remembered. One of them is the first editor of the Toronto Jewish Journal, a Yiddish daily that, beginning in 1913, appeared for more than 50 years. His name was Hershel Hirsh. Besides being a prolific journalist, translator and storyteller, Hirsh wrote two books of original and rhymed Yiddish fables, published first in Toronto in 1915 and enlarged in a Montreal edition in 1918.

No major Canadian-born Yiddish poet has emerged yet

In 1917, also in Toronto, a tiny volume of Yiddish poetry was published by 16-year-old Percy (Pesach) Matenko, son of Yitzhak Matenko, principal of the National Radical Jewish School, the forerunner of the Workmen's Circle Peretz Shule. Afterward, the young Matenko published many Yiddish poems in the Toronto Jewish Journal and other periodicals. After receiving his doctorate in linguistics from Columbia University, Percy Matenko remained a lover of Yiddish, but he devoted his time and talent to literary studies in English.

A similar wunderkind of Canadian Yiddish poetry was Montreal-born Aaron Kristalko, son of Yiddish teacher Shifre Kristalko. His volume of poetry titled Gut Morgen Dir Velt, published in 1954, was greeted by poets Sholom Shtern and Zishe Weinper as the arrival of a new Canadian-born major Yiddish poet. However, Aaron Krishtalko, like Percy Matenko, soon abandoned Yiddish writing and became a teacher at an English college in Montreal.

Another unique figure among Canadian Yiddish poets was Abraham Seltzer, who arrived in Montreal in 1924 and worked in a millinery shop. In his free time, he wrote sensitive lyrical poems. Some were published in periodicals, the rest left in the Canadiana Archive of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal. Due to an unhappy love affair, at the age of 24, he committed suicide by drowning himself in the St. Lawrence River in 1930.

Today, in addition to me, there is only one other person writing and publishing Yiddish verse in Canada. Grunia Slucky-Kohn, a Holocaust survivor who lives in Montreal, is the author of several poetry collections. One of them won a Toronto Jewish Book Award. She publishes her poems and fables in the Algemeiner Journal, a New York Yiddish weekly, and other Yiddish periodicals.

Despite the fact Yiddish language and literature are taught at McGill University, the University of Toronto and several other Canadian institutions of higher learning, no major Canadian-born Yiddish poet has emerged yet. The creations of close to 30 highly talented Canadian Yiddish poets remain hidden and neglected on the shelves of libraries and archives. Except for a book on the earlier Yiddish poets by Hanania Kaiserman (published in Montreal in 1934) and the Lexicon on Hebrew and Yiddish Writing by Chaim Leib Fox (Montreal, 1919), no serious study of Canadian Yiddish poetry has appeared. Only a tiny fraction of the work of Canadian Yiddish writers have been gathered into the two anthologies that have been published so far appeared (in 1966 and 1982). Even less has been translated into English. The works of several generations of Canadian Yiddish poets still wait to be researched, read and appreciated by future generations.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Excellence is the MBA's mantra. It is the adjective most frequently used in describing thriving businesses. A search of Amazon.com will show that no less than 4,693 books, most of them business related, have the word excellence in their title. This is quite understandable, because excellence in business can make the difference between profitability and bankruptcy.

You don't have to be a businessman to understand the importance of excellence. Everybody wants to be excellent at something. One of the great themes of both philosophy and theology is that true happiness is found only in the excellence of the soul. Indeed, the Bible makes clear that God's creation of the earth is one of excellence, repeating seven times in the first chapter that the creation "is good" or "very good." Excellence and perfection seem to be the divine blueprint.

Remarkably, perfection fails. The first time a human aspires to what "is good," she eats forbidden fruit. This inauspicious beginning to human history foreshadows a lengthy narrative of human failure. In fact, the aspiration for perfection is often the very thing that leads to failure.

Perfectionist standards can often be destructive. Perfection at work comes with a price. The workaholic may excel at his job, but will not have the time to enjoy the fruits of success. Achieving perfection at home is just as costly. For the Martha Stewart wannabe, entertaining and decorating is a daunting task. Every brioche must have panache; every custard must be a gastronomic masterpiece. Unfortunately, the culinary tour de force arrives with high blood pressure and a nervous breakdown. Ironically, perfection in one realm often brings about imperfection in another realm, as if to remind us that humans were programmed to fail.

Actually, human error is an actuarial fact, an ever-present reality of everybody's lives. One can only trust machines to be perfectly accurate. Any human attempt to replicate the rigid efficiency of machines is bound to be a cold and unhappy fiasco. Aspiring for absolute perfection is both quixotic and frustrating.

Where human excellence is found is in the creative use of failure. Imperfection may be flawed in many ways, but it is the perfect environment for human growth. Indeed, what is most meaningful about life is the daily drama of our struggles with imperfection. Those who can find useful lessons in past failures have found the perfect way to master an imperfect world.

The midrash states that tshuvah, repentance, the religious response to failure and sin, was part of the world's blueprint. What this suggests is that inadequacy is inevitable, and true human excellence is finding a positive use for failure. Or, to paraphrase the well-known cliché about lemons and lemonade, "When life hands you failure, make tshuvah."

In life, any hope for perfection is itself imperfect. True excellence is finding a way to transform failure and make spiritual lemonade.

Let's disengage from the polarizing rhetoric

Gil Troy in Montreal

As Israel's disengagement from Gaza approaches, extremists from both sides dominate the debate. Shrill voices describe a wrenching gamble in absolutist terms, as either good or evil. The fanatics share a clarity I lack, demonizing those who disagree with them and myopically ignoring the risks in both pulling out and staying put.

How can disengagement supporters ignore Palestinian terrorists' feelings of vindication? Hamas' Mahmoud Zahar told the London Times on April 14 that "nobody can deny that if Israel is going to leave the Gaza Strip and part of the West Bank that was because of the intifadah, because of the armed struggle, because of the big sacrifices of Hamas for this goal." The day before, WorldNetDaily quoted Zahar's confidential memo vowing that "withdrawal from Gaza is not the end of the story."

After the London bombings, with the West insisting that terrorism does not succeed, does anyone have second thoughts? In a sane, just world, instead of rewarding the Palestinians with $3 billion (US), wouldn't British Prime Minister Tony Blair and U.S. President George W. Bush tell Israel, "We understand your desire for clearer boundaries, but please postpone the pullout until we pressure Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas to crush terrorism, so the message is clear: zero tolerance toward terror entails zero concessions?"

Leftist venom for "the settlers" is equally unfathomable – they spit out the term like a curse. Remember, Israel entered Gaza after a war of self-defence that was triggered by hostile neighbours – and the hatred remains. Many "peaceniks" can empathize endlessly, sympathize promiscuously, even rationalize Palestinian terror, yet treat fellow Jews contemptuously. Can't we commiserate with the individuals who must uproot their homes, their communities and even their cemeteries, because few doubt what Palestinians would do to Jewish graves left behind?

At the same time, I can't understand how disengagement opponents can claim God says anything about Jewish settlements in Gaza. My Bible says Gaza was Philistine land, while my history books note that even former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin tried to return Gaza to Egypt – an offer Egyptian leader Anwar Sadat shrewdly refused. I cannot abide those who odiously compare the Gaza pullout to Holocaust-era expulsions, equating a sovereign Jewish state's political calculations with Nazi evil. Moreover, I cannot explain how moral democrats can overlook the moral and demographic challenges stemming from controlling 3.5 million Palestinians, even while seeking Israeli security. Finally, can we forget that Israeli government subsidies attracted many individuals to Gaza, and that their sales contracts reserved the government's right to buy them out, if necessary?

Amid the haze, this is what I know.

First, Israel deserves tremendous credit from the world for being the only country in history to offer land legitimately won from a neighbour in self-defence for peace – credit it will never receive.

Second, it's not appropriate for me to proclaim publicly where Israel should draw its borders. People I respect on both sides of the issues have earned the right to hash it out by paying taxes, serving in the army and voting as Israeli citizens.

Third, disengagement supporters should welcome "the settlers" into their new homes enthusiastically, saluting their sacrifices when the government asked them to live on the border, and saluting their sacrifices in leaving their homes.

Fourth, disengagement opponents must echo MK Effie Eitam, hesder yeshiva rabbis and other disengagement critics who nevertheless renounce violence and won't encourage soldiers to disobey orders. Democracy's fundamental social contract provides rights to dissent and responsibilities to obey. Too much Jewish blood has been shed already for Jews to threaten other Jews. We should excommunicate anyone who crosses the line, from overzealous police officers to overzealous zealots.

Finally, even if the headline-seeking and polarizing hysterics of the right, left and media triumph and the debate degenerates, remember that Israel won its latest war. No matter what Hamas says, the disengagement emerged only after Israel crushed the Palestinian Authority, justifiably. Disengagement is part of a broader strategy that seeks clearer boundaries with an effective fence. Israel showed that terrorism kills individuals, but can unite a nation. The Palestinians expected Israel to crack, never anticipating Israelis' disciplined ferocity, tactical creativity, and social solidarity.

Israelis have provided a model for New Yorkers, Londoners and others targeted by Jihadists. Israel can now demonstrate how citizens can disagree vehemently but not violently, democratically but not destructively, all the while remaining patriotic as their government seeks complicated answers to confounding questions.

Blue, white and orange must embrace each other

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

On the way from Ben-Gurion airport, strips of coloured cloth were thrust toward the car window. At points where traffic to Jerusalem slowed or stopped, there they were: young Israelis, offering drivers the narrow strips of blue, or orange, or blue and white, that could be seen waving from the antennas of many of cars on the road.

The coloured strips were a chromatic shorthand for political positions pertaining to the contentious issue of the impending Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, scheduled for Aug. 16. Orange is the colour of the settlers' movement, an offshoot of the orange stars worn briefly several months ago by Gaza settlers and their supporters in an ill-considered analogy between the Jewish residents of Gaza and the Jews of Europe under Nazism. The star soon disappeared as a public emblem of the settlers, but orange remained as their symbol.

The blue strips, and blue and white strips tied together, connote approval of the Israeli government's plan to withdraw from Gaza. A young man who offered the bi-coloured ones explained, "It's the colour of the Israeli flag." Recently discharged from regular army service into a reserve unit, he had lost several friends defending settlements in Gaza. The loss of life on behalf of a region that he felt had neither strategic value nor biblical roots (it was Philistine, not Israelite territory) had persuaded him of the correctness of the government's present determination to relinquish Gaza.

En route from the airport, my husband, who has the heart and soul of a historian and archivist, wanted to collect all of the coloured cloths waved in our direction as artifacts of a particular moment. My brother set the kiddie locks on the car windows. "Collect them on your own time," he told us, "and not in my car." My brother's car, barely half a year old, was pristine: no cloths of any colours, no bumper stickers. And he intended to keep it that way. It's not that he had no opinions on the matter of withdrawal. "I'm political." He explained. "My car is not."

Who could blame him? About a year ago, the Israeli rap group Hadag Nahash released The Sticker Song, with lyrics by the renowned Israeli novelist David Grossman. For some time, Grossman had been keeping track of slogans he'd seen on bumper stickers, eventually composing a poem that juxtaposed them ironically against one another, undercutting the absolutism expressed by the stickers and highlighting the danger of reducing complex political positions to simple phrases.

The catchy slogans may provide effective rallying cries, but they make more difficult the possibility of reasoned talk between parties who differ. In the video for the song, singers wear clothing that stereotypes the groups whose political opinions are represented in the lyrics: army reservists, religious settlers, hip Tel Avivians, followers of Reb Nachman of Bratslav, Arabs, and others.

As the song progresses, each singer becomes progressively angrier, reflected in gestures and voices. Each one's image is reflected alone in multiple mirrors, suggesting that the simplification inherent in slogans prevent us from speaking with anyone who is not exactly like us.

Israelis and supporters of Israel hold a range of political views. Feelings run deep because the issues matter. The progress of the country is bound up in each person's ability to empathize with his or her political opponent, without the stereotyping that slogans inspire.

In a recent interview in Ha'aretz, Yehonatan Bassi, the man charged with implementing the disengagement from Gaza, observed, "My job is to remember that although the process is correct and necessary, it is the residents of Gush Katif who are its casualties. They are the casualties of the inconsistent policies of the Israeli government in the 1970s and 2000s."

While polls indicate that the majority of the country favors withdrawal from Gaza, Bassi warns that "the crucial test for Israel today is whether it knows how to embrace the settlers. Will the country understand them and identify with them and nurture them?"

Bassi's challenge extends well beyond the specifics of Gush Katif. Israelis and lovers of Israel must reach beyond divisive sloganeering to embrace, identify with, and nurture one another.

The Kirshner File

Russian immigrant leaves an impression

At the relatively tender age of 24, Lena Gorelik is riding high. With a published novel behind her, and a second novel bubbling in her brain, she is remarkably successful. Not bad for a writer whose knowledge of German was nil until her arrival here 13 years ago.

Sheldon Kirshner in Munich

Gorelik, arguably Germany's answer to the Russian Canadian novelist David Bezmozgis (Natasha and Other Stories), is the author of My White Nights, a melange of fact and fiction. Anja, the central character, is a young Jewish woman coping with her dual Russian and German identities in her adopted homeland.

"In the end, she discovers she can be both," she said in a recent interview over a meal at a restaurant in the centre of Munich.

Published last September to favourable reviews in the German, Austrian and Swiss media, My White Nights, suffused with wry humour and laced with a touch of melancholy, established Gorelik as one of the brightest new voices in Germany's burgeoning Russian Jewish community.

Next to Wladimir Kaminer, the 38-year-old Berlin-based short story writer, radio talk show host and pop culture celebrity whom newspaper editor Boris Feldman effusively describes as "the most famous Russian in Germany," she is probably the best-known Russian face in this country.

Born in St. Petersburg about a year after the collapse of Soviet communism, she wrote the semi-autobiographical My White Nights in a frenzy of creativity over a frenetic four-month period.

Drawing on experiences from her own life as a model immigrant, she found that the story came easily to her. She was asked to write it after ably translating a Russian novel into German.

Gorelik, who has always aspired to be a writer, was studying journalism in Munich when she composed it. While finishing her degree as the school's first student from the former Soviet Union, she freelanced for newspapers in Munich and Berlin.

These days, between readings of My White Nights at book stores throughout Germany, she is working on an MA in East European studies at Ludwig Maximilian University in Munich, where she has lived for the past four years.

"I don't want to be an academic," she explained. "I want to use this knowledge as a journalist."

Come next year, she will file stories from Moscow for a German news agency that hired her for a three month stint. "It will be an adventure," Gorelik said. "I'm looking forward to it."

In the meantime, her publisher has informed Gorelik that a second edition of My White Nights is in the works and that talks about publishing it in English, French and possibly Russian are proceeding.

Gorelik, whose conversation is layered with sardonic humour, has begun writing her next novel. "It will be about Judaism in Germany," she said.

For someone who knew virtually nothing about the subject in St. Petersburg, a novel turning on that theme must surely be rated as something of an accomplishment. "Until I was eight or nine years old," she recalled, "I didn't know what a Jew was. It was not a topic in our home."

So blissfully unaware of her background was she that she once tossed off an anti-Semitic curse. "Hey, you're a Jew," she told a school classmate.

Hearing this, her mother, an engineer like her husband, brought her up to speed about their Jewish origins.

Food shortages were common, unpaid salaries were the bane of workers and hostility toward Jews was never too far from the surface.

And, of course, her parents thought she and her older brother, Max, would have a better future in the West.

These were compelling enough motives for emigration. But the matter was only finally settled by an anti-Semitic incident in which her father was the victim.

In a train compartment, a fellow passenger deliberately rubbed his shoes on her father's trousers. Then another man did the same, saying that Jews should leave Russia. "That made the difference," said Gorelik, whose great-grandfather was a yeshiva rabbi.

Now the question was where to go. Her brother, having learned Hebrew, hoped to settle in Israel. But her parents vetoed that idea, thinking Israel would be too different, "like another world."

Lena Gorelik

Their preference was actually the United States or Canada, but due to various restrictions, these destinations were off-limits to them.

They chose Germany because it seemed like a decent compromise, its Nazi past notwithstanding. Germany was closer than Israel, it was European, its climate was familiar and its safety net of social support services, unemployment insurance and German language courses was attractive.

Learning German was the toughest obstacle the Goreliks had to overcome. Clueless initially, she spoke fluent German within three months. Brother Max, a computer consultant, has mastered German as well.

Gorelik's mother, a bookkeeper in a bank, speaks an excellent German. Her father, a retiree who was employed as a technician, gets by. Residents of Ludwigsburg, they are pleased that she and Max have adjusted to Germany so well.

"I feel complete acceptance here," she said. "My everyday life is not different from that of my German friends."

She seems to have no overriding qualms about Germany's Nazi legacy. "I know it happened, but it's not the fault of the younger generation. It's over. It's history, though we have to make sure that something like this never again happens in Germany, or in any other country."

Her parents miss their old friends in Russia, Israel and Canada. "They didn't become Germans, though they have German friends, read German newspapers and go to the theatre."

Despite her apparently seamless integration into German society, she is still culturally Russian. But for every Russian book she reads, she goes through 10 books in German.

Gorelik, who was in Canada last winter to attend a conference on Jews in Germany held at the University of Toronto, would not mind living in Canada or the United States for a year or two at some juncture in the future.

But for now, she is comfortable in Munich. As she put it, "Germany is my home."

Jewish Life

The "joy" instead of the "oy"

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN

This week we observe the fast of the 17th of Tammuz, marking the beginning of a three-week mourning period memorializing the destruction of the First and Second temples.

It is a sad time of summer, one that interrupts camp and cottage life and forces us to re-examine – in the midst of our fun – our relationship to the tragedies of our history. The destruction of the ancient central symbol of Jewish worship and life was a cataclysm of huge proportions. And, like every pogrom and every calamity of Jewish history, it was one more example of being hated, reviled and oppressed.

However – and this is a big however – I would like to think of our victimhood as an aberration of what it means to be Jewish, not a definition.

In her book God and the Victim, Elisa Lampman speaks of how religious value becomes attached to being a victim. Sacred memory and stories of valiant suffering all help to make sense of tragedy and help to assign meaning to being a victim. But the danger of romancing victimhood is great. We have to be diligent not to make a religion out of memorial.

Shelby Steele, a black writer, has written powerfully about the romanticization of victimhood. He warns against a "victim mentality" in which he says a person needs to see one's self as a victim in order to have a self-identity. In effect, he writes, "Being a victim gives you a perverse sort of 'status.'"

If we Jews are not to enjoy that kind of "perverse status," then Judaism must be an affirmation rather than a negation. It is a Jewish obligation to replace the centrality of our suffering with something more than both Fiddler on the Roof and Anne Frank combined. We are not victims. We are survivors. Victims live in the past. Survivors live in the present, with faith in the future.

In my outreach work with those Jews who feel disenfranchised or disengaged, one theme keeps ringing out – why do they only hear tales of woe; as Salo Baron put it, "the lachrymose view of Jewish history"? Why do they hear so much all the time about the ongoing fear of anti-Semitism lurking in every corner and the communal anxiety over intermarriage, along with dire warnings and hand-wringing? Why do they not hear more about the richness of Judaism, the beauty of Jewish culture, the fun and passion and zest of Jewish life? Without in any way negating or dismissing our past and all its horrors, why can't we focus on the "joy" of Judaism as much as the "oy?"

This for me is a valuable lesson of the destruction of the Temple: that we see ourselves not as members of some sad, underdog race but of a modern people, strong and proud, who do not see themselves – and do not wish anyone else to see them – as living in the shadows. I was most powerfully struck by this tension the last time I was in Israel on Tisha b'Av.

Here we were, weeping at the Western Wall for its history, and yet overjoyed that we could pray there in the present moment. Thus we saw ourselves neither as victims or victors, but perhaps best as witnesses to a living, joyful, vital faith that has survived the destruction and become a modern, contemporary and relevant way of life.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein is the rabbinic director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto.

'Warm, close family' part of Chabad's appeal, says author

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

If there's a key to the success of Chabad Lubavitch, it's the combination of its emissaries' strict adherence to Jewish law and their non-judgmental embrace of other Jews, says Sue Fishkoff, author of The Rebbe's Army: Inside the World of Chabad-Lubavitch.

Speaking recently at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, the California-based JTA correspondent noted that in less than 40 years Chabad has become a billion-dollar outreach empire with more than 4,000 shlichim in more than 70 countries.

Her talk, titled "What is it about Lubavitch that attracts secular Jews?" commemorated the 11th yahrzeit of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

Despite predictions that the organization would "if not collapse, at least lose its forward momentum" after the Rebbe's death, the half-dozen years that followed were its years of greatest growth, and it is continuing to grow, she said.

"What is most intriguing, particularly in North America but also in the former Soviet Union [both places where Chabad's growth is greatest], is that overwhelmingly the people who come to Chabad classes and services, who send their kids to Chabad summer camps, are the Reform, Conservative and unaffiliated Jews whose values, beliefs and lifestyles would seem very far removed from those of the Chabad infrastructure they're supporting."

Fishkoff said that, for her, Chabad shlichim, who typically start as young couples in their early 20s, exemplify the Jewish values she learned as a child but doesn't necessarily take the time to put into practice herself – visiting sick people, inviting strangers for Shabbat, calling people who are alone in the community, making a point of not embarrassing people.

Over and over, she said, she heard from people like the woman who never heard from her congregation when her husband was sick with cancer, but the Chabad rabbi from the next town visited every day throughout his illness.

When she was researching her book, Fishkoff spent many days with Chabad families. Sometimes, she said, it was 2 a.m. before they had time to sit down for an interview.

"What can other Jewish streams learn from what Chabad is doing?" asked Fishkoff, who belongs to a small Conservative congregation. "How can we incorporate that into our lives, our synagogues, and our hearts?"

She said it was "an incredible lesson" for her to see teenage boys in Portland, Ore. teaching Torah to people old enough to be their grandparents with "such sensitivity, such intelligence, and such confidence without arrogance."

Although Fishkoff's book focused on the American Chabad experience, she said she couldn't resist travelling to Thailand to attend a Chabad seder for 800. In Bangkok, she said, three shaliach couples serve the needs of about 250 local Jews and thousands of Israeli backpackers who travel there after their army service.

"These are young Israelis who at home would never set foot in a synagogue, let alone a Chabad House," said Fishkoff. Those attending seders in the Far East "will not put on black hats and move to Kfar Chabad, but they'll have a warm memory of a Jewish ritual and a guy in a black hat they could speak to and who had things to say. I think those seders will go further than anything else to breaking down that religious/non-religious divide [in Israel]."

In the United States, said Fishkoff, Chabad has been able to offer classes "appropriate to a college-educated, lay audience in a way that doesn't talk down to people."

Many people told her they were attracted to Chabad by "'this nostalgic vision they had of the warm, close Chabad family.'"

In fact, she said, many parents from wealthy communities told her they wanted the Chabad shlichim as role models for their non-materialistic values. "I found that fascinating – what it said about us as well as Chabad."

Also, she noted, Chabad's celebration of Judaism "speaks to the Jewish soul. Judaism doesn't just come from the head."

But Chabad also forces you to ask questions of yourself," Fishkoff said. "That has happened to me. I can't say I've become any more observant, but I know that every day I'm much more Jewishly aware and more aware of myself as a Jewish person in relation to the world in a way I wasn't before.

"If Chabad can convince people never to be complacent, but to keep challenging themselves, it will help us become better Jews and better human beings."

Jewish Life

Our greatest loss

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Over the next few weeks the summer continues to unfold and the Jewish calendar moves closer to Tisha b'Av. The three weeks leading up to Tisha b'Av are understood to be weeks of increasing intensity and meaning as we contemplate our history.

The destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem and our subsequent exile is a constantly present event in a Jewish life. We mourn the downturn of Jewish history and the thousands of years of being at the mercy of world politics and anti-Semitism. The Talmud records ancient debates on why such an event could occur and indeed Jews have been discussing this question for millennia.

Tradition tells us that both the First and the Second temples were destroyed on Tisha b'Av. However, the reasons given for the two destructions are very different. The Talmud states that the First Temple was destroyed because of the immoral behaviour of ancient Israelites. The three sins for which a Jew should allow death to prevail rather than transgress them were violated during the First Temple era. These sins are: idolatry, sexual crimes and murder. According to the sages, we lost the First Temple due to our total betrayal of Jewish values.

There are differing opinions as to the reason for the destruction of the Second Temple. The most often cited reason states that baseless hatred was the cause. During the time of the Second Temple, there were many different factions of Jews each believing they had the true understanding of Torah. They were so judgmental and antagonistic toward each other that at times they informed on fellow Jews to the Romans. Although what was at stake was what each considered the "true" understanding of Torah, the sages termed this behaviour "baseless hatred" and we lost the Temple.

Another interesting midrash also appears in the Talmud and discusses several incidents with a man named Bar Kamtza. He deliberately sets out to incite anger between Caesar and the Jews and invalidates a sacred offering sent by Caesar to Jerusalem. Although his action endangers all the Jews and brings war to their doorstep, Rabbi Zechariah insisted that Bar Kamtza not be executed since his crime was technically only invalidating an offering. Rabbi Yochanan will later remark that the scrupulousness of Rabbi Zechariah destroyed the Temple and caused our exile.

When we collect the reasons given for the destructions of the temples, they include betrayal of Jewish values and scrupulous adherence to Jewish law. These are offered to us as two extremes on a sad continuum of Jewish history. Both Jewish values and Jewish law are mechanisms that allow us to express ourselves as Jews. They are not weapons, and Jewish history has shown us that when they become weapons, they quickly turn against us. Underlying the events is baseless hatred, the animosity that makes Jewish groups judge and condemn one another.

Over the next few weeks events in Israel will reach a climax as modern politics express themselves in an ancient Jewish land. There are voices calling for military disobedience, strict religious scrupulousness and, in some cases, a betrayal of Jewish values. It is most timely to take a moment and remember Jewish history while recounting ancient texts.

The sages in our Talmud were not recording history; they were warning of repeating it.

Readers' favourites, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Here is the second part of one of my irregular roundups of sites that readers feel people should know about. The sites may be labours of love created by readers – or ones that readers find themselves coming back to time and again.

A while back, I did a column about sites that can help track down lost friends, like the buddy you made on the kibbutz. I wrote, "Calling all ex-Banana Boys! Your friends are looking for you." And then I told you about a site [www.lostamigos.net/] where someone was trying to find old friends – also known as the Banana Boys – from Kibbutz Bet Zera. Allen Lash came across my article and wrote to tell me that he was indeed one of those boys. Lash also recommends John Carson's Kibbutz Volunteer Board, where you will find hundreds of messages from people trying to reconnect with their pasts. [http:// tinyurl.com/6odvk]

Earlier this year, the United Nations held a special commemoration to mark the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. As always, Larry Grossman is vigilant about tracking down important Jewish-related audio and video to make its way onto the web. You can watch the three-hour UN General Assembly webcast online. [http://tinyurl.com/chj5n]

Rav Roy Tanenbaum of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation is clearly proud of his shul's Torah4Kids website. "As far as we know, Torah4Kids, or 'Canaan Hora – Dancing with the Torah,' is the only parshah page of its kind, written for modern kids leading modern lives. We think the content is beautifully written, week after week, in sophisticated language, yet language kids can understand. Fresh, exciting and thoughtful, it has open-ended questions, a section for table discussion, a weekly quote in English and Hebrew, and always there is a link to something from the sages." I checked the site when Parshat Chukat was featured: "Thirty-eight years have passed, and things are starting to happen. Join us this week for sad farewells, big mistakes, bad kings and scary snakes." Is that how you remember Torah from day school? [www.torah4kids.net]

The folks at 1media.org wrote to tell me about their project: the digital recording of historical Jewish graveyards and cemeteries in Germany. Earlier this year, they finished their largest project so far. They photographed and documented all the graves at the Rat-Beil Strasse cemetery in Frankfurt am Main – 100 years of Jewish culture in 17,000 high-resolution photographs. Most of the databases can be purchased on CD-ROM, but some are free and can be searched online and downloaded at no charge. [www.1media.org/English/home.htm]

I bet Rabbi Benjamin Hecht never dreamed he'd be promoting a radio station back when he was studying in yeshiva. But Mesorahradio.com isn't your typical radio station. Rabbi Hecht writes that this Internet radio station "features Torah study presentations in different formats and offers shows by leading institutions in the world Jewish community. For example, Yeshiva University offers two shows, one of which features the leading talmudic scholars of their school. The Israel Aliyah Center also offers a show at this site." [www.mesorahradio.com]

The 17th Maccabiah Games are now wrapping up in Israel, and Efrat Yaari would like you to know that you can watch highlights of the games, including videos of games and interviews with athletes, at Ynetnews.com. Look for their feature on the right side of the page. [www.ynetnews.com] Not to be outdone, also check out the special sections at the Jerusalem Post [http://tinyurl.com/a88lt] and Ha'aretz [http://tinyurl.com/84vr6].

Finally, here's a site that I've been meaning to tell you about. You've probably heard that Steven Spielberg is planning to direct a film about the murder of the Israeli athletes at the 1972 Olympics and Israel's secret hunt for the perpetrators. [http://tinyurl.com/ab8sj] That Israel's spy agency has never publicly admitted to the hunt is not surprising. But the Mossad did surprise some observers when it set up its own website in both Hebrew and English. [http://tinyurl.com/2ls88] First, read about the intelligence agency's history and vision. Its motto is, "Where no counsel is, the people fall, but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety." (Proverbs 11:14) Then would-be James Bonds can take a careful look at the application form.

Premier's response on school funding disappoints Toronto cantor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eric Moses, the cantor of Beth Sholom Synagogue, is not in the habit of sending letters.

But when he read in The CJN last month that the United Synagogue Day School had lost more than 200 students in the past two years and that Eitz Chaim Day School had lost more than 400 since 1992, he felt compelled to write to Ontario premier Dalton McGuinty to make a case for government funding of faith-based schools.

Moses, the father of a three-year-old and 19-month-old twins, wrote that he was "deeply troubled" by the statistics.

"Canada is a mosaic society, and we take pride in our diversity," he wrote. "The only way to guarantee a future for our religion is to educate our children."

He noted that in Montreal, where he spent five years as a cantor, there was a high level of Jewish commitment and Jewish education. "The greatest reason," he wrote, "is that the Quebec government funds faith based day schools." Tuition for Jewish days schools in Montreal, at $5,000 to $6,000, is approximately half of what it is in Toronto, he noted.

Religious education is now an unreachable dream for many Ontario families, he wrote. "What do I tell my members who cannot afford it?"

In his June 29 reply, McGuinty wrote that improving public education is his government's "number one priority." He called high-quality public education "the cornerstone of a just society and the key to our long-term prosperity."

Wilma Davis, a spokesperson for the Ontario Ministry of Education, said she was not aware of any government discussions regarding funding for private schools.

The provincial government "recognizes that there are many hard-working families who make sacrifices to send their children to faith-based schools," McGuinty wrote. "We have the utmost respect for your views and those of other Ontarians who disagree with our government's stance on funding for independent or religious schools. However, we remain deeply committed to restoring confidence in and stability to our public education system."

Moses, who earlier this year agreed to join the letter-writing committee of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools – a grassroots group of parents – told The CJN he was "very disappointed" with McGuinty's response. "He didn't address… the complaints in my letter. It's like we're speaking different languages."

Moses feels that the Ontario government's stance on funding is unfair to all religions. The Equity in Education Tax Credit introduced by the previous Tory government was cancelled after McGuinty became premier in 2003.

Two years ago, Moses employed a Filipino nanny when his wife was ill. "She was so proud that as a new immigrant, her children could go to a Catholic school [with the help of government funding]. I said to her, 'Regrettably, I can't do the same.'"

"It's a human rights issue," he said. "We're just asking to be treated in the same manner [as the Catholic community]."

He does not believe that supplementary schools are the answer. In his letter to McGuinty, he wrote that children are not interested in attending school on the weekend or after a long day at school.

The high cost of Jewish day school "is actually lowering the Jewish birth rate," Moses believes, based on discussions with friends and others in the community. "People can't afford it. Often, couples will have two children, and then the third child is a big decision."

War vet turns 100 next month

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Retired Regimental Sgt.-Maj. Sam Cohen, who celebrates his 100th birthday on Aug. 12, defies all medical logic.

"He eats all the wrong foods, such as pastrami with fat and fried foods, and he smokes more than a package of unfiltered Sweet Caporal cigarettes a day," says his daughter Theresa Strom.

"We have to order the cigarettes for him, because very few stores carry these unfiltered cigarettes."

The centenarian was interviewed recently, accompanied by his three daughters: Strom and twins Marilyn Weinrib and Joscelyn Kasman.

Cohen lives on his own on Shaw Street in the house he purchased after he returned from the war. His wife passed away 14 years ago and although his family has encouraged him to move to a more protective environment, he adamantly refuses.

His parents came from Kiev, Russia, but met and married in Toronto. Cohen says his family name was originally Kagan, but it was changed to Cohen by an immigration officer who asked his father, David, his name, and because he didn't speak any English, he replied that he was a kohen. His father operated a butcher shop at College and Markham streets.

Sam Cohen was born in Toronto and attended Harbord Collegiate. He operated a grocery store on Lippincott Street, but in 1940, he ran into financial problems because he had extended credit to too many customers who couldn't pay him. He was forced to close the store.

He decided to enlist in the Toronto Scottish Regiment and served in the machine gun unit. His daughter Theresa was 10 years old and the twins were one year old when he left. He served in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, England and Luxemburg.

Seen at a recent family simchah with their father Sam Cohen, who will be 100 on Aug. 12, are, from left, Joscelyn Kasman, Marilyn Weinrib and Theresa Strom.

He was wounded on his forehead by shrapnel fire in France from a bombing raid. On his return from active duty, after receiving many medals, ribbons and citations, he decided to remain in the army. He retired from the army at age 60 and went to work for a security company until his retirement at 78.

Cohen has been involved with General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion, whose mandate is to help war veterans. It supports Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre and other charitable causes.

One of the highlights of his life, he said, was returning to the Netherlands in 1970 for the 25th anniversary of that country's liberation.

Kasman said her father is still sharp.

"He has a great memory. He reads the newspapers from front to back, and when we have lunch, he tells us the news and what's going on. He also does the crossword puzzle every day."

Weinrib says, "At my daughter's wedding three years ago, my father made a long speech without a note and he got a standing ovation."

In a note to The CJN, Gianna Kasman, one of Cohn's 12 grandchildren, wrote that her grandfather knows all the Blue Jays' and Maple Leafs' statistics, "and he leads the Passover seder every year."

Her grandfather is the "king of the 30-second telephone call," she said.

"I speak to my Zaida every night at 10 p.m., and he always asks me, 'Are the kids sleeping? Is your husband sleeping? And is the dog sleeping? Your dog is so lazy, but such a good dog. And why aren't you sleeping?'"

When asked what he attributes his long life to, Cohen replied, "I've been smoking since I was 14. I guess it's natural and good genes."

Family and friends will join Cohen to celebrate his 100th birthday at a party on Aug. 14, when they will share stories, and view photographs and other mementos.

Asked what he looks forward to, Cohen replies, "I look forward to my birthday and after that, we'll see."

IsoArk used to treat patients

As well, "you can put a patient here and you can treat them through these gloves without getting suited up," he said, referring to a pair of arm-length, plastic gloves that a doctor outside the chamber would use to treat a patient inside.

"Because of the clear plastic, [people inside the chamber] don't feel claustrophobic, because you can see out, but also, the nurses can see in and talk to the patient."

There are also airtight sleeves for cables, wires and tubes that allow patients to be treated inside the chamber while most of the medical equipment remains outside the chamber to avoid contamination.

"We're really proud of this as an Israeli product," Helleman said.

Resa's Pieces packs Leah Posluns

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

It began as a semi-joke for people who always wanted to play an instrument or hadn't had a chance to play since their youth.

Five years later, the Resa's Pieces adult amateur concert band took to the stage for their fourth annual year-end recital at the Leah Posluns Theatre at the BJCC.

Adrienne Cohen, director of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, School of Music, said that "Resa's Pieces is one of the Koffler school's treasures," and "enables adults from diverse backgrounds in the community to come together in friendship and music."

The band's conductor, Resa Kochberg, who by day teaches instrumental music to children from grades 5 to 8, said that the men and women who make up the band are "a true testament that it is never too late to do something you have always wanted to or go back to something you once loved."

At their first concert, Resa's Pieces, made up of 16 musicians, had an audience of 75, mostly family and friends. Their 2005 summer solstice concert saw a packed hall and band of 35.

The highlight of the evening for the band was their performance of Instant Concert, a piece made up of 30 different melodies and played within 3½ minutes.

The piece is reputed to be one of the most difficult to play and conduct, but after three years of practising, the band played without a hitch.

As an added dimension to the evening, audience participation was encouraged with a sing-along led by actress and singer Lizzie Kurtz.

Children were also given the chance to show their musical talents when during the song Jamaica Farewell, all were asked to join the band on stage and were given shakers and tambourines to play in time with the music. Kochberg later noted the importance of music for body, mind and soul for people of all ages.

Both Cohen and Kochberg stressed that Resa's Pieces is open to new members, including those who have never played before and people who want to get back to a hobby they once loved.

For more information about Resa's Pieces, call Adrienne Cohen at 416-636-1880, ext 228.

Zac Kaye

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In his ten years in Toronto, Zac Kaye has seen – and been responsible for – many changes for Jewish students at local universities and colleges.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life offers testimony enough. Canada's first purpose-built Hillel building, the 12,000-square-foot showpiece opened last year as home to Hillel of Greater Toronto and home base for Jewish students at the University of Toronto.

Also, the organization's budget has tripled, as has its staff. Kaye began with half a dozen staff in all, but U of T and York University, with an estimated 4,500 Jewish students each at the time (and more now), really needed a minimum of five staff, he said.

Last year, the Toronto organization – which was originally known as Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto – received accreditation from Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, recognizing its adherence to Hillel's national standards, as well as its relationship with the universities and the local Jewish community.

But less tangible changes, albeit related, have to do with the "strong, vibrant community on campus" that University of Toronto medical student Ron Somogyi, a former president of Hillel at U of T, described at Hillel of Greater Toronto's annual awards night in May.

Kaye – a native of Manchester, England who headed Hillels in Australia and Vancouver, B.C. before moving here – "rolled up his sleeves and made it happen," said Somogyi in tribute to the Hillel veteran who received a Founding Friend of the Campus award that night.

When Kaye arrived in Toronto to create a citywide umbrella organization for university and college campuses, existing programming was weak, Judaic content needed improvement, and the existing individual campus organizations functioned differently from one another and "had different ideas," according to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Morris Zbar, who hired Kaye.

But the biggest issue – even more significant than underfunding and a lack of cohesiveness – was that the vast majority of Jewish students at Toronto universities and colleges lived at home, recalled Kaye in his sunny, third-floor office at the Wolfond Centre.

Although Kaye believes that Hillel services and opportunities should be the same for students regardless of where they live, he noted that making Hillel relevant to commuter students means competing with "many different agendas."

In an effort to reach out to students who lived at home – many of them in Thornhill – on-campus programs were supplemented by citywide events like Shabbat dinners that were held off-campus. Commuter students "weren't necessarily going to shlep out to U of T or York in the evening," said Kaye.

Kaye has also promoted partnerships with other Jewish organizations including the Reform, Conservative and Orthodox movements in an effort to reach more students.

One of the first changes Kaye made was to begin sending students to Hillel leadership conferences – about 30 of them the first year alone. Some of the meetings addressed concerns like the environment, which students already had an interest in. "Within a couple of years we saw a real enthusiasm, a real turnaround."

Although Hillel of Greater Toronto's annual budget has increased from $420,000 a decade ago to $1.3 million today, Kaye says the organization runs "a tight ship."

In the early days, the main focus was on Jewish identity and continuity, a community buzzword in the 1990s. "As much as Israel was important and Israel Weeks [on campus] were impressive, there was equal focus given to Jewish identity issues."

But the atmosphere on campuses in North America changed with the onset of the second intifadah in September 2000.

"Our agenda moved very quickly from the Jewish continuity agenda to a very strong Israel agenda."

In Toronto, said Kaye, the watershed moment was the January 2003 talk by American academic Daniel Pipes at York University. The event, which was temporarily cancelled because of security concerns, took place under heavy security, and was preceded and followed by protest rallies.

Although the federation had increased funding to Hillel several years earlier – evidence of an increasing awareness of the importance of the campus years – political events on campus "certainly brought to the attention of the broader community that campus is a critical place where the leaders of tomorrow are fashioned and created," said Kaye.

But at the same time that Hillel's focus was increasingly Israel-related, it was also branching into other areas in an attempt to reach out to Jewish students who might not otherwise be interested in the organization.

An annual Arts and Culture festival – which received the Elie Wiesel Award, given by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life for originality and innovation in campus arts and culture programming is one example of the type of "niche" programming that broadened Hillel's appeal.

"Hillel was no longer the 'one size fits all' model," Kaye said. "That's something I passionately believed in. It was very important to bring that model to Toronto."

"He [has] consistently encouraged students to run with their ideas," said Somogyi. "In seven years I never heard Zac say no to a student without seeing obvious sadness on his face."

"Personally," said Kaye, "it's been very rewarding to take students to conferences and to Israel [as part of Birthright and also leadership conferences] and see them sort of blossom as campus leaders or as students who really care about what being Jewish is all about."

Siblings honoured by Britain for their wartime service

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Sixty years after the end of World War II, Bert and Abby Smollen have been honoured by Britain for their wartime service.

Neither the British government nor their own families were aware until now of the Smollen family story, but a soon-to-be-published book by James R. Stevens brought the story to light.

As a result, the two brothers were recently awarded World War II service and campaign medals by British High Commissioner David Reddaway at a reception for the Royal Commonwealth Ex-Services League.

The brothers were part of a British family of six siblings – five sons and a daughter – who all enlisted when the war broke out.

When they joined, they were unaware of the situation in Germany or the danger for Jews, said Bert, now 86, who was in the Royal Air Force.

Abby served with the Northumberland Fusiliers from Newcastle and landed in France three days after D-Day.

By the end of the war, their three other brothers were dead.

Dennis died in February 1943 at age 21 in a bus accident. The following January, Joshua "Jossy," 29 and newly married, was reported missing when his plane disappeared somewhere over the Mediterranean Sea. Harold, a paratrooper, was 19 when he died on a booby-trapped bridge in Germany.

When the war ended, their mother emigrated to Canada with her remaining two sons and daughter Rita, who has since died.

Bert, who had been stationed in Canada during his service, decided to move to Vancouver. The rest of the family settled in Montreal.

No one spoke of what had happened.

"We never wanted to publicize anything of our unfortunate events that took place," Bert said.

His son Sheldon accompanied him to the award ceremony.

"It is consistent with Holocaust survivors who don't want to tell anything to their children… he is a survivor as well – not a Holocaust survivor, but a survivor of World War II," Sheldon said of his father.

"I wish my mother could have been alive to see this. I just found out that my own cousins never knew that she had been in British intelligence," Rita's daughter Janice Greene said. "She did talk to me about it, but I think I was the only one."

During a formal ceremony on the grounds of Earnscliffe, the residence of the British High Commissioner, Bert and Abby Smollen were presented with their own medals, as well as medals for their three deceased brothers.

"It is marvellous, after so many years, to recognize the heroism and sacrifice of this family," Reddaway said.

Plotnick has a long history in Jewish education and youth projects. A decade ago, he founded ProMontreal, a federation project to encourage young Jews to stay in Quebec. He is a past president of the Jewish Education Council of Montreal, now known as the Bronfman Jewish Education Council, and he is a past Montreal and national chair of the March of the Living.

Encouraging young people to have the "same passion and dedication as their parents and grandparents" about Israel and Jewish life is his wish.

It was under Plotnick's watch that the Montreal federation underwent an expansion and renovation costing tens of millions in the late 1990s, a time when the community's mood was sombre.

Plotnick's natural optimism came through in his acceptance of the UIAFC mantle: "While the needs are great, and the challenges might even appear overwhelming, we have a great opportunity to make a difference," he told the annual general meeting.

Plotnick is the fifth president since the UIAFC was established in 1998 as a result of the reorganization of United Israel Appeal of Canada and the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada. It brings together 10 federations and 40 non-federated regional communities (27 in Ontario alone).

One of its major functions is funnelling the funds raised in annual UJA/CJA campaigns that are not spent locally. Last year, it sent $27.3 million to Israel and elsewhere overseas, and it allocated $25.6 million to national programs and services in Canada.

JEWISH WAR VETS MEMORIAL LAUNCHED: Gerald Schwartz, above, CEO of Onex Corp. and honorary chair of the Jewish War Veterans Memorial, recently launched a $7-million fundraising campaign for Flames of Memory, a memorial to Jewish combatants everywhere. To be located in Earl Bales Park, the memorial will be designed by world-famous architect Daniel Libeskind and situated on two acres of land donated by the City of Toronto. The structure is a dramatic, sweeping chanukiyah soaring 16 metres into the sky, with an amphitheatre in the centre and two walls at the rear to be inscribed with names – all encircled by the flags of 32 Allied nations. A groundbreaking is planned for Aug. 14. To donate, call 416-736-6744. [Ron Csillag photo]

Spouses of stroke survivors find their lives change

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

People who return home after having a stroke must accept that there will be differences in what they can do as well as how they perform certain tasks, and they must learn to accommodate their new limitations.

But the adaptations and changes are not only on the part of the patient – life will also be different for the family, especially the spouse.

Noomi Katz and Adina Hartman-Maeir, of the school of occupational therapy, faculty of medicine, Hadassah and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, reported on a study of stroke survivors one year after discharge from hospital. They recently spoke at the Wagman Centre of the Baycrest Centre, at an evening sponsored by the Baycrest Centre Foundation and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Among the possible results of a stroke are paralysis, disruptions in vision, memory loss, depression and a lack of awareness of cognitive deficits, Katz said. These problems spill over into all areas of life, from the ability to care for oneself, to whether one can go back to work, and even what leisure activities a person is able to participate in.

The study showed that while the majority of those who survived strokes were fairly independent in such activities as eating, hygiene and grooming, "40 per cent needed at least minimum assistance in getting around, and many needed some help in dressing, bathing, shopping and doing laundry," said Katz.

> 'Forty per cent needed at least minimum assistance in getting around, and many needed some help in dressing, bathing, shopping and doing laundry'

Not surprisingly, the study also indicated that satisfaction with life in general was higher the more they followed their old lives and activities and the better their abilities in carrying on were.

Caregivers, she said, were at serious risk if they stopped participating in social and recreational activities. The study indicated that, for caregivers, there was a significant correlation between the level of participation in activities and both satisfaction with life in general and maintaining health.

The study also showed the need for ongoing rehabilitation and support in the community, psychological counselling and support for caregivers.

Hartman-Maeir presented a case study of a couple, Isaac and Miriam. Before his stroke, she said, Isaac was very independent and enjoyed a variety of social and leisure activities, including bridge, a travelling club, a book club and using a computer.

He suffered a right-hemisphere stroke, which, Hartman-Maeir said, left him unable to see things on the left side. For instance, he shaved only the right side of his face, ate the food on the right side of the plate and read the right-hand side of a page of writing. At the same time, he seemed unaware of these deficiencies.

Through what Hartman-Maeir called guided discovery, Isaac was allowed to "experience his abilities and disabilities in a supportive and safe environment." He learned to "do systematic searches of his environment from the left side," for instance.

A virtual reality computer simulation program developed by Katz allowed him to safely practise navigating busy streets, although not to drive.

While Isaac was unable to drive and was unable to continue in his travel club, he was able to resume reading and playing bridge. He also took up arts and crafts. "Being in a group where he wasn't compared to how he used to be made a big difference," Hartman-Maeir said.

As for his wife, Miriam, "she was happy to help him, provided he realized and accepted that he needed her help."

Hartman-Maeir agreed with Katz that help from qualified professionals is essential for those who have survived strokes. As well, she urged caregivers to "take care of yourself. Do the things you like to do."

It is perfectly normal, Katz said, in response to a question from the audience, for the partner of a stroke survivor to show anger, grief and resentment. Support groups can be very helpful in this regard, she said.

Hartman-Maeir noted that some people preferred to be in groups of stroke survivors, while others preferred to reintegrate into the general community, and said either option is fine. People can belong to several different communities, too – for instance, a physical therapy group for stroke survivors as well as a painting group at a local community centre, she said.

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

Each day, TV, radio, magazines and newspapers announce the newest study that demonstrates the value of today's latest "superfoods" – foods with health-enhancing, disease-fighting micronutrients. Dana Jacobi, an award-winning food writer, chef and author of five cookbooks, shows you how easy and delicious it can be to enjoy and prepare these superfoods in her latest cookbook, 12 Best Foods Cookbook: Over 200 Delicious Recipes Featuring the 12 Healthiest Foods (Rodale).

Jacobi identifies the 12 foods containing the most potent micronutrients in an easily digestible way. Her list includes blueberries, black beans, sweet potatoes, oatmeal, salmon, spinach, broccoli, tomatoes, chocolate, walnuts, soy and onions. Almost all of her recipes contain at least two or more of the 12 best foods. Each recipe comes with nutritional information and there are useful tips on shopping, preparation, food safety, food facts, plus much more. The recipes are organized by chapters, from delectable dips to delicious desserts.

Jacobi exploits each food's abundant nutritional value in irresistible dishes like Lean Mean Chocolate Chili, Spinach Strudel, French Toast with Hidden Blueberries and Hot Chocolate Soufflé with Strawberry Salsa. You'll discover the pure pleasure of eating foods that are truly best for you. Most of the recipes are suitable for the kosher cook, and there is certainly much food for thought!

BROCCOLI VICHYSSOISE

The silken texture of this chilled dairy-free soup comes from the pureed potatoes. For dinner, Jacobi recommends eating a cup of soup the minute you walk in the door. Then get comfortable and get the rest of dinner ready. With the edge off your appetite and in a better mood, you'll eat smaller portions and enjoy putting a balanced meal together instead of grabbing the first thing you see.

1 bunch broccoli
2 leeks, white parts only, coarsely chopped
1 medium onion, coarsely chopped
1 shallot, chopped
2 potatoes, peeled and diced
½ to 1 tsp. salt
freshly ground black pepper
2 tbsp. snipped chives, for garnish

Chop the broccoli florets, including the thinner stems just below the florets. Reserve the lower stems for another use. Place the broccoli in a large saucepan or a small Dutch oven. Add the leeks, onion, shallot, potatoes, salt and a few grinds of pepper. Pour in 4 cups water and bring the liquid to a boil over medium-high heat. Reduce the heat, cover, and simmer until the vegetables are very tender, 30 to 35 minutes. Let the soup sit for 10 minutes to cool slightly.

Purée the soup in a blender until it is smooth or use an immersion blender in the pot. Chill thoroughly, 3 hours to overnight. Adjust the seasoning. Divide the cold soup among 4 bowls and garnish each with one-quarter of the chives. Makes 4 servings.

Per serving: 103 calories, 0 g fat, 0 g saturated fat, 4 g protein, 22 g carbohydrates, 4 g fibre.

Israeli Arabs want some attention

By GIL SEDAN
JTA

HAIFA — You tell elections are approaching in Israel when political interest in the country's Arab population increases.

The issue has received a great deal of attention in recent weeks. In fact, primaries for the Labor party chairmanship were postponed because of suspicions that many of the recently registered Arab party members were indeed bought.

Some 30,000 of the 130,000 registered Labor members are Arabs, making them the party's largest constituency. Is it because thousands of Israeli Arabs have suddenly turned Zionist, or is it because each of the five candidates – Shimon Peres, Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, Ehud Barak, Matan Vilnai and Amir Peretz – is in need of the Arab vote?

Israel's one million-plus Arabs are like children hungry for attention, and suddenly the political arena is paying attention to them. The Knesset law committee heard last month from Justice Theodor Orr, chair of the state inquiry commission that investigated the October 2000 riots, that the state has not done enough to implement the commission's recommendations. Far-right legislator Avigdor Lieberman came out with a campaign calling for "disengagement from the Arabs." And various academic symposia are discussing how to upgrade the status of Israeli Arabs.

Nearly five years ago, days after the Palestinian intifadah began, Israeli Arabs took to the streets in the most violent riots since the establishment of the State of Israel.

Now they temporarily enjoy positive attention. The town of Sakhnin, where past clashes with security forces had ended in bloodshed in 1976 and 2000, is now the symbol of Arab-Jewish coexistence, mostly thanks to a successful soccer team.

Interior Minister Ophir Pines-Paz has recently appointed an Arab, Oscar Abu-Rizek, as director general of his ministry.

The Arabs yearn to be embraced, but who wants to embrace them? That's what one can conclude from a new report by Haifa University sociologist Sammy Smooha, who has been measuring Arab-Jewish attitudes in Israel since 1976.

The report summarizes Smooha's findings over the years, saying Israel's Arab citizens are much more motivated to be fully integrated into society than the Jewish population is willing to integrate them.

But it also contains a positive discovery disputing the common belief that radicalization of the Arab population is unavoidable as long as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict continues.

"Reality dictates coexistence, and the radicalization process is not mandatory," Smooha said at a recent symposium at Haifa University discussing his findings.

Smooha's survey was conducted among 700 Jews and 700 Arabs. Some of his findings are:

- Most Arabs, nearly 71 per cent, are willing to live in mixed neighbourhoods with Jews. Only 34 per cent of Jews agree.
- Most Arabs, 73 per cent, support mixed education, while 52 per cent of Jews are opposed.
- Fully 80 per cent of Arabs would like an Arab party to be included in a government coalition. Most Jews, nearly 58 per cent, do not want Arabs to participate in the political executive branch.

The bad news is that 48 per cent of Arabs said they don't trust Jews, and nearly 58 per cent of Jews said they don't trust Arabs – so much so that nearly 72 per cent of Israeli Jews said they wouldn't enter an Arab settlement in Israel.

But Smooha says such figures were even higher in the past.

Smooha has shown that both sides feel threatened by the other. Lieberman's recent campaign for "disengagement from Umm el-Fahm," an Israeli Arab city that is home to the fundamentalist Islamic Movement, has increased Arab fears of "transfer" or of a possible territorial exchange with a future Palestinian state.

On the other hand, Israeli Arabs fail to understand that Jews feel threatened.

"How can they feel threatened? They have an atomic bomb," Smooha quoted Arab respondents as saying of Israelis.

Some 53 per cent of the Arabs declared that they feel "alien and rejected" in Israeli society, but 64 per cent feel "proud in the country when it succeeds," such as after a recent soccer match with Ireland where Israel managed to tie, thanks to a goal by an Arab player.

One of the more interesting findings draws a distinction between a Jewish and a Zionist state. Whereas 70 per cent of Arabs said they "support Israel's right to exist as a Jewish democratic state," not even 14 per cent support "a Jewish Zionist democratic state" – that is, one that accepts Jews who want to make aliyah.

In other words, the Arabs are willing to accept Israel as is, but reject Zionism because it implies that Israel is not just a Jewish state but the state of all the Jews in the world.

"The Arabs refer to Zionism as racism," Smooha explained.

Faisal Azaizeh, head of the Arab-Jewish Institute at Haifa University added, "The Arabs say, 'We have no problem with a humanistic Jewish state,' but they also say, 'Don't impose the Zionist project on us.'"

What are the political implications of the survey?

"There is no doubt that the historic process is one of rapprochement. For the first time, the Arabs accept that the Palestinian 'right of return' should apply to the future Palestinian state only," Smooha said. "In the 1970s, most Jews didn't accept the notion of a Palestinian state, and now they do. Jews and Arabs alike are sobering up to realize that not only the other side is guilty."

But Smooha added that Israeli Jews needed to re-evaluate their own definitions of the state, since Arabs now number some 20 percent of the population.

"Once the Arab proportion in the population reaches 25 per cent, it will be difficult to maintain Israel as a Jewish national state," Smooha said.

Britain stuck on Nazi-looted art

By DANIELLA PELED
JTA

LONDON — A dispute over four Nazi-looted drawings currently in the British Museum is likely to lead to a change in British law to allow art stolen in World War II to be returned to its legal heirs.

The Old Masters in question, once part of a large collection belonging to Arthur Feldmann, a Jewish lawyer and a passionate art collector, were confiscated by the Gestapo on the day the Germans invaded Czechoslovakia, March 15, 1939.

When descendants of Feldmann and his wife – who both died in the Holocaust – submitted a claim for the artworks in May 2002, the British Museum acknowledged their right of ownership of the drawings it had acquired in 1946.

Museum trustees agreed to return the items, worth around $260,000, declaring that the case represented a "unique moral claim." But they were prevented from doing so by the British Museum Act of 1963, which effectively bans the institution from dispersing any part of its collection.

The case touches on a particularly delicate subject for Britain as there are fears that a move to return such items could set a precedent affecting disputes over priceless British Museum artifacts such as the Parthenon friezes, known as the Elgin Marbles. Greece long has lobbied for their return; they were removed from the country in 1816.

Seeking a way around this legal barrier, in August 2003 the museum asked Britain's attorney general, Lord Goldsmith, whether the unique moral circumstances surrounding the Feldmann collection would override the law.

Goldsmith in turn consulted Britain's High Court, which ruled in May that the attorney general did not have the power to override the act and that the law would have to be changed to allow such an outcome.

"No moral obligation can justify a disposition by the Trustees of an object forming part of the collections of the museum," said Vice Chancellor Sir Andrew Morritt, who presided over the hearing.

The High Court decided that the issue of the Elgin Marbles is "irrelevant" to the Feldmann case, but it remains highly sensitive.

"It is now beyond doubt," said a spokesperson for the British Museum, "that when there is a claim for an object in the British Museum collection, which can be proved to have been stolen from a Jewish family by the Nazis, the object cannot be returned without the authority of an Act of Parliament."

The government has agreed to start the process to change the law so that looted art can be returned to its original owners or their heirs.

The administration "entirely accepts it is an important issue and will put things right," said a spokesperson for Britain's department of culture, media and sport.

But that will take time. The earliest a change in the law could be instituted would be November 2006, and campaigners are unhappy at the slow pace with which the issue has progressed.

A committee of the department of culture told the government to introduce legislation on restitution five years ago. That call was reiterated in April by the Spoliation Advisory Panel, a body set up in 2000 to mediate disputes concerning Nazi-looted art.

Anne Webber, of the Commission for Looted Art in Europe – a London-based nonprofit founded in 1999 by the European Council of Jewish Communities and the Conference of European Rabbis to oversee all issues relating to Nazi-looted art – which is representing the Feldmann heirs, expressed disappointment that restitution still was not available three years after the claim appeared to have been settled.

"The British Museum agreed to the claim within weeks," she said. "They are very committed and see it as an exceptional moral case."

Feldmann started his collection, which includes works by Titian, Rubens and Rembrandt, in the early 1900s. It grew to encompass 750 works.

The drawings in the British Museum are St. Dorothy with the Christ Child by a follower of Martin Schongauer; Virgin and Child, Adored by St. Elizabeth and the Infant St. John by Martin Johann Schmidt; An Allegory on Poetic Inspiration with Mercury and Apollo by Nicholas Blakey; and The Holy Family by Niccolo dell'Abbate.

Feldman was arrested and tortured to death two years after the Nazis entered Czechoslovakia and seized his collection. The following year his wife was deported to Auschwitz, where she died. The couple's two sons survived the Holocaust, and their children live in Israel.

"Given that Britain has been at the forefront of the effort to research collections and has led the field internationally," Webber said, "it's a great shame there hasn't been similar work to… enable art identified as looted to be restituted."

Israeli strategic policy needs a shake-up: expert

By PAUL SHINDMAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Prof. Yehezkel Dror, a well-known prognosticator and expert in the field of planning theory, may be ruffling more than a few political feathers with his latest paper on the future of Israeli strategic policy.

Yehezkel Dror

In it, Dror, a political science professor at Hebrew University, says Israel faces new threats in the next 30 years from terrorism and radical extremism that must be dealt with by breaking out of the box of traditional thinking and adopting what he calls a "grand strategy" to deal with the new world order.

"The security and political and environment facing Israel in the next 10, 20 or 30 years is radically different from the past," Dror told The CJN. "Therefore, there is a need for a radically different grand strategy."

His paper, titled a "Breakthrough Grand Strategy for Israel," was presented at an international conference on Israel's strategic agenda, held earlier this month by the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar Ilan University,

Among the 10 major points in his plan is a call for a tighter integration of Israel's diplomatic and military channels and more proactive, rather than reactive, initiatives by the Jewish state.

Dror also challenges the conventional model of wars studied by the Israeli government and military, saying the traditional model must be replaced by one that takes into account future threats posed by terror and extremism.

"Thinking should not be in terms of 'wars,'" Dror said. "We have to get out of this box. Instead, speak about the mixture between conflict negotiation, threats, promises. It does not mean that there will not be violence, but the violence will not take the form of classical wars."

While he proposes a model that includes a readiness to make concessions for peace, he said this should also come with a readiness for "half-crazy behaviour" if Israel is hurt.

Reaching a balance between the two would entail Israel giving the world a very cautious hint that pushing it into concessions that threaten its existence as a Jewish state could lead to non-rational behaviour.

He leaves no doubt as to what this could be, writing that Israel should send out the quiet but clear message that "a fatal attack on Israel would leave western Asia destroyed."

In other words, the new strategic policy he envisions would be built on a position of strength.

Reforming Israel's electoral system may be a necessary prerequisite for implementing part of the grand strategy, which would include the Jewish nation, and not just Israel, building relations with Islam, Dror says.

He also asserts that Israel must avoid the "trap of dependence on the Christian West" and reach its own co-existence with Islam.

"There is a high price to be paid if Israel doesn't change its strategy," he warned.

Dror doesn't think Canadians can relate to the challenge Israel is facing.

"Countries like Canada have great difficulty understanding it, because they are in a different cosmos."

Speaking the day after the recent terror attacks on London's transportation system, Dror said "it may change now with all this terror, but [Canadians] believe that the world is becoming better and that more human rights will make more security.

"I don't think that most Canadians have a sense that the world includes a potential for significant new forms of mass killing violence."

In this respect, Canadians may be a bit naive, he suggests.

"It's a continuation of the classical belief [that] everything will be fine, just let's try to get more democracy and everything will be peaceful. This is not necessarily my view of the future, regretfully."

OSCE urges end to Israel boycott

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) has unanimously called on Arab countries to end the economic boycott of Israel.

In a resolution adopted at the organization's recent parliamentary assembly in Washington, D.C., the OSCE urged its "Mediterranean partners" – Algeria, Egypt, Israel Jordan, Morocco and Tunisia – "to work with the Arab League to rescind the trade boycott of the State of Israel."

The resolution was part of a comprehensive package of recommendations adopted by the 55-member OSCE to create a climate of tolerance and advance economic relations while helping resolve the Mideast conflict. It also puts pressure on member states and OSCE observers like the Mediterranean group to conform to OSCE policy, said Senator Jerry Grafstein, treasurer of the OSCE parliamentary assembly and head of its liberal, democratic and reform group.

The OSCE represents 55 mostly western states with a mandate to advance human rights and economic and security co-operation around the world. Its Mediterranean partners have observer status at OSCE assemblies.

Calling the resolution a "breakthrough," Grafstein said the "boycott has served as a continuing obstacle to economic and democratic co-operation and growth between member states of the OSCE, Israel and our other Mediterranean partners."

Grafstein said ending the boycott would be part of a broader range of measures that would increase economic co-operation and friendly relations in the Middle East.

Senator Jerry Grafstein in Cordoba with a statue of Maimonides

Some advances have already been made in that sphere, he said, thanks in particular to the creation of qualified industrial zones (QIZ).

One QIZ involves Jordan and Israel and allows Jordanian products to enter the United States tariff free if they contain no less than eight per cent Israeli input in their manufacture.

The QIZ has proven remarkably successful in bringing Jordanians and Israelis together, Grafstein said. "It's going like gangbusters. Fifteen thousand people are employed there."

Egypt has expressed interest in a similar QIZ on its border with Israel, he added.

Grafstein suggested similar industrial zones could involve other Mediterranean states and he urged Canada to sign free trade agreements with Jordan and Morocco to provide similar incentives to regional co-operation. (Canada and Israel already enjoy a free trade agreement, as do the United States and Israel.)

Grafstein said the OSCE's Washington resolution" sets up incentives to get off the war track and get on the economic track."

The resolution also calls on OSCE states and its Mediterranean partners to promote "the principles of non-violence, tolerance, mutual understanding and respect for cultural diversity."

In other developments, the OSCE's ministerial wing met recently in Cordoba, Spain, to discuss steps against anti-Semitism "and other forms of intolerance." That meeting took place a few weeks prior to the Washington session.

The Cordoba Declaration urges member states to take action on the education front, adopt tough new legislation against anti-Semitism, gather data about racist incidents and enforce existing laws, Grafstein said.

He referred the Cordoba Declaration to the standing Senate committee on human rights for consideration.

However, he said, an earlier referral of the OSCE's Berlin Declaration against anti-Semitism languished in the Senate for years before it was referred to committee for brief discussion.

Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, attended the Cordoba meetings as part of the Canadian delegation. He said a positive outcome of the OSCE session was the continued reference to "anti-Semitism" as an issue in its own right.

In Berlin three years ago, pressure from European states led to the appointment of three rapporteurs to examine anti-Semitism and other forms of racism, specifically those directed against Muslims and Christians. Congress was concerned anti-Semitism would be dropped into a broader reference to all forms of racism, Morgan said.

The Cordoba session, which examined how the Berlin Declaration has been implemented, showed progress has been made in eastern European states, which have introduced legislation against racism and anti-Semitism. It remains to be seen if these countries enforce their new laws, Morgan said.

Grafstein said "the country that has made the most remarkable progress in the last three years in the [European Union] has been France."

Led by President Jacques Chirac, the French government finally appears to have taken the issue of anti-Semitism seriously, he said, adding that the French leader has led marches against anti-Semitism while the government has enforced its anti-racism laws.

"France has done a U-turn on this," Grafstein said.

Suicide bombing in Netanya

Five people were killed – a woman aged 50, a 31-year-old woman, a 21-year-old soldier and two teenage girls – in a suicide bombing in the coastal resort city of Netanya. Some 30 people were wounded in the blast, which occurred at a shopping mall. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack. The White House condemned the bombing and demanded that the Palestinian Authority take action to dismantle terror organizations. PA President Mahmoud Abbas condemned the bombing as "idiotic" and said those behind it would be punished.

Target: Islamic Jihad

Israeli forces raided Tulkarm, the West Bank city that was the launching pad for the suicide bombing by Islamic Jihad in Netanya. Troops and tanks swept through the city before dawn last Wednesday, clamping a curfew on the city. A Palestinian Authority police officer fired on the soldiers, wounding two of them, before he was shot dead. The army said it would remain in the city until the masterminds of the attack were captured. Five suspected terrorists were arrested.

Pinpoint targetting

In further efforts to prevent terrorism against Israelis, the Israel Defence Forces resumed its policy of pinpoint targeting of militants in the territories, killing four members of the Palestinian Islamic movement Hamas in the first targeted strikes on terror suspects since September 2004. Air Force helicopter gunships fired missiles at a car carrying members of Hamas, killing three of them, Palestinian sources said.

Gaza settlements sealed

Israel declared Gaza settlements off limits to outsiders ahead of their evacuation. The 21 settlements became a closed military zone under an order signed by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. Former chief rabbis Avraham Shapiro and Mordechai Eliyahu issued a halachic ruling Friday forbidding soldiers from complying with the order. According to the ruling, soldiers "are not to participate in the closing and blockading of Gush Katif, and are certainly not to desecrate the Sabbath for such purposes."

No more withdrawals

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon hinted that the upcoming withdrawals from the Gaza Strip and northern West Bank will be Israel's last. "There will not be another disengagement," the prime minister said in a speech to police officers. It was not clear if Sharon was ruling out any further withdrawals, or just withdrawals Israel carries out unilaterally, in the absence of a peace deal with the Palestinians. But he voiced hope for implementing the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, which envisions a peaceful Palestinian state alongside Israel. "If there is quiet, terrorism stops outright and the terrorist groups' weapons are collected, we can move on to the next stage of the road map," Sharon said.

Museum for Ethiopian Jews

A museum focusing on Ethiopian Jewish culture and heritage will be built in the Israeli city of Rehovot. Ha'aretz reported that the museum, which will cost $4.5 million (US), will include a model Ethiopian village and a memorial to Ethiopian Jews who died in Sudan on their way to Israel. "We view the conservation of the past as very important and believe the museum will attract young people and adults alike," Rehovot Mayor Shuki Forer said.

Holocaust 'tattoos' as protest

Several Gaza Strip settlers wrote their Israeli identification numbers on their arms in a bid to recall concentration camp inmates' tattoos. The Yesha settlers council urged the protesters to abandon the ploy. "The plan by some right-wing activists to put their identity numbers on their arms perverts the historical facts and damages the memory of the Shoah," said Avner Shalev, chairman of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial. "It is important that the memory of the Shoah remain a unifying factor in Israeli society, not the opposite."

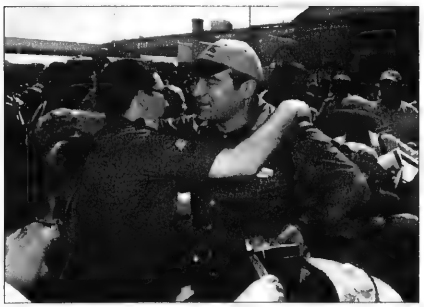
'Welcome home to the promised land'



The following are the remarks made by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to the olim from Canada and the United States at Ben-Gurion Airport Wednesday, July 13.

Good day to all of you. Joy and sadness often go hand in hand here. Your arrival is a great joy to us, but yesterday [in Netanya] we faced another murderous terrorist action which certainly saddens us all. I take this opportunity to send my condolences to the families of the victims and wish a speedy recovery to those who were injured.

Yesterday, I instructed the security forces to increase our activities and target, as much as possible, the heads of the Islamic Jihad terrorist organization. We will not stop until they cease their murderous attacks.

Aliyah is the primary goal of my government. The future of the Jewish People and the State of Israel depends on Aliyah.

Israel is the only place in the world where it is possible to lead a fully Jewish existence. Only here can you ensure that your children and grandchildren will remain Jewish.

Your being here is very important to us. Maybe this is the most important thing for the Jewish people, to live here – for all our people to be moving over here.

I promise you that we will do all we can to assist you on this journey home, although I must tell you that we had a little talk here, and we already discussed the proposal that next year, Nefesh B'Nefesh will bring 10,000 Jews from other countries, from the United States and Canada.

Life in Israel is not always easy. But you have our support, and we will help you in any way we can.

I hope that you will encourage your friends to make aliyah, to raise their families here alongside your families, and to build their homes and businesses here.

I wish to say to you and to Jews all over the world: We always needed you, but we need you now more than ever.

Come to Israel. We need you here.

Thank you.

Literary legend back in limelight with collection

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In her day, Fannie Hurst was one of America's highest-paid authors, but ask any bookstore clerk today for one of her 18 novels, such as the bestselling Imitation of Life, and chances are you'll receive nothing but a blank stare.

Between 1914 and 1930, Fannie Hurst's phenomenal literary career blazed meteorically across the pages of popular magazines like Cosmopolitan and the Saturday Evening Post. A notice on a magazine cover boasting of a new Fannie Hurst story or an advertisement on the side of a New York city bus would ensure that the magazine would quickly sell out at the newsstands.

In an effort to restore some of Hurst's lost vogue, the New York-based Feminist Press recently published The Stories of Fannie Hurst, containing 18 stories from the author's prolific output of more than 300. The offerings include the wonderful Sob Sister, Humoresque, A Boob Spelled Backwards and She Walks in Beauty, all of which seem to convey Hurst's largely forgotten, yet irresistible appeal.

Whereas contemporary writers like William Dean Howells and Abraham Cahan were experimenting with a new urban realism, Hurst specialized in sentimental realism. She often championed the simple, uneducated, young working girls, secretaries, manicurists and shop-girls. Her heroines and heroes were often stereotypical samples from the "greenie" generation of Jewish immigrants and their more sophisticated children, who quickly became proficient in America's rich but mystifying street patter.

She excelled in long scenes of dramatic dialogue, depicting troubled mother-daughter relations, illuminating the unbalanced power relationship between men and women, and casting a light into the hidden and private places of everyday life. Her turf was New York City's endless array of shops, tenements and boarding houses, as well as the female boudoir.

"The richness, variety and authenticity of Fannie Hurst's early portrayals of urban Jewish life stand as one of her major achievements – and one of the reasons for us to read her work today," writes editor Susan Koppelman in an introductory essay.

Sob Sister is a sentimental, somewhat purple masterpiece in which a kept woman named Mae Munroe is dumped by her long-term lover. At story's end, all of her chances used up, she rushes despondently out into the Manhattan night.

Walking and walking, she comes eventually to a river and becomes mesmerized by the lapping waves and the strong tug of current. The piece closes with the following line: "Out at the very edge the water washed up against the piles with a thick, inarticulate lisp, as if what it had to say might only be understood from the under side."

Hurst was not always a master of brilliant economy and subtlety. Many of her stories open with some abstracted classical allusions, a technique that seems today as heavy and old-fashioned as steamer trunks. It must also be said that she sometimes wrote like a gifted high school student punch-drunk in love with her thesaurus.

For these reasons, and because she appealed to a mass market, critics often took a dim view of her. Some dismissed her as a "glorified true confession scribe" and the last of the gaslight romanticists. One reviewer said her prose flowed like the Mississippi, adding that both were "wide, deep and rather muddy."

But none of that mattered to the millions of readers, predominantly women, who avidly consumed and were thrilled by her stories. And why not? In Hurst's heyday neither the talkies nor television had been invented yet.

Born to German-Jewish parents in Hamilton, Ohio, in 1885, Hurst grew up in St. Louis, Mo., as an overweight, unhappy child. Bored by her parents' provincialism, she fled to New York around 1910. Soon she was selling stories for $10 and $25, but once her popularity caught on, she was commanding fees of $100, $300, $1,200, $1,500 and ultimately $5,000 per tale. When she was at the top of her game in the '20s, only F. Scott Fitzgerald was getting as much.

Her 18 novels were translated into 14 languages and inspired multiple Hollywood treatments. A total of 29 films were made from her fiction, including Imitation of Life (produced twice, in 1934 and 1959), Humoresque (1920 and 1946) and Back Street (1932, 1941 and 1961). She also wrote five plays, a full-length autobiography and several screenplays.

"[She] became a celebrity in a way that is today reserved for movie, music and sports stars," with the press following her every step in Central Park and her every jaunt across the Atlantic, Koppelman said, adding that Hurst tumbled into sad obscurity long before her death in 1968.

Koppelman argued that part of the reason she is neglected today is because she was female. "Fannie Hurst's writing career was so productive and so successful and so important that if she had done nothing else but write, we would be able to say Dayeinu – it was sufficient," the editor said. "But she was also an activist in the service of social justice causes."

Hurst took up her pen to promote causes related to health and feminism. She also lobbied against fascism and anti-Semitism, and helped raise funds for many charities and philanthropies. But according to Koppelman, her greatest achievement was her purposeful elevation of the ordinary "little" people, ennobling them as the proper subject of fiction. Hurst conveyed an "absolute conviction that the lives of her characters are just as important as that of any character created by Shakespeare," Koppelman wrote.

Indeed, so realistic were her portrayals that she received many letters from readers certain she had been writing about their own families or circle of friends.

Hurst's stories are especially recommended to anyone keen on understanding the conditions that prevailed a century ago when millions of Jewish and Gentile immigrants arrived as strangers in the bustling, fresh, complex and marvelous land called America.

Tough sounding Murderball a sensitive documentary

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Despite its tough sounding title, Murderball is at heart a sensitive and eye- opening documentary about a group of wheelchair bound quadriplegics who play "quad rugby", a rough and tumble variation on the game.

But if your idea of a quadriplegic extends only to that of the late actor Christopher Reeve, the movie will be an eye opener.

"We all have a warped perception of what [being a quadriplegic] is – we do have stereotypes, we do have biases and all these clichéd ideas of what it means to be a quadriplegic," says Dana Adam Shapiro, who co-directed the film with Henry Alex Rubin.

"A lot of that has to do with Christopher Reeve; he was sort of the face of quadriplegics, for better or for worse."

If Murderball, which is now playing commercially and which opened the Hot Docs documentary film festival in Toronto last April, does anything, it changes that face of quadriplegia, introducing the audience to a diverse group of men who don't conform to what we might expect.

There's tough talking, tattooed Mark Zupan, who was injured when he was thrown from the back of his friend Christopher Igoe's truck, where he was sleeping. (Igoe, who was intoxicated at the time, has never come to terms with what he inadvertently did to his friend, a back story that plays out poignantly in the movie.)

Joe Soares was stricken with polio as a child and is considered a traitor by Zupan because he's now coaching Team Canada after being turfed by Team USA. And there's Keith Cavill, a young man who has just lost the full use of his limbs in a motorcycle accident and begins to find himself again through his attraction to the game.

Murderball brings those men and others to the fore, with healthy doses of humour, competition and exciting movie making, shot from the point of view of the disabled athletes themselves. "The film is shot from their perspective… [It] is like being in a room with them."

The men profiled in Murderball are seen warts and all on screen, whether it's Soares' initial discomfort, even coldness, in the face of his non-athletic son's interest in music or Zupan's genuine hatred for Soares.

"I'm very happy that we found these characters who are so polarizing," says Shapiro, a former senior editor at Spin magazine and current writer for the New York Times magazine, who in addition to also co-producing the film with Jeffrey Mandel, wrote the initial article on Murderball for the men's magazine Maxim in 2002.

Shapiro, whose first novel (The Every Boy) has just been published, was especially drawn to the now 30-year-old Zupan, as a subject for the two Murderball projects. "He doesn't look like a paraplegic; his physicality goes a long way to crushing the stereotype."

Zupan also comes across more vividly in the film than in the article, which true to Maxim's macho creed emphasized the sport more than the men who played it.

"We never set out to make a sports film," says Shapiro. "It was all about what it's like to break your neck and in that story is what it's like to break your best friend's neck and what it's like to be the son of a guy [who's disabled]…

"These are universal stories more then sports stories; sport was 10 per cent of the movie, [the rest was about] friendship, fatherhood etc."

In capturing the murderball players' reality, Shapiro and Rubin, both Boston- born 31-year-olds and longtime friends, also dispensed with the traditional tropes of many documentaries, such as the talking heads approach to the subject or the emphasis on story to the exclusion of the camera work.

One interesting subject in the film, never developed as well as it could be, is the intense Canadian-American rivalry on the court. Rubin and Shapiro are well aware of the fact that Team Canada's hunger to beat the Yanks is rooted as much in cultural and political antecedents as in basic win-lose scenarios but "the protective veil" around Team Canada prevented us from getting more footage with them," says Shapiro.

On the other hand, Shapiro praises Canada for funding wheelchair athletes – "Canada has a much better program in terms of funding. (The athletes) are subsidized by their government, Americans aren't."

During and after filming, having become close friends with Zupan and Keith Cavill, in particular – "We definitely became close to Joe but he's not our age," says Rubin – the filmmakers are extremely pleased with the positive reaction from the quadriplegic community. "You guys nailed it (we were told)," says Shapiro. "Usually movies about them are unintentionally condescending, they sort of cue the violins at the end – aren't they so inspiring? – and they tend to increase the space between you and them – I'm so happy to be me, translation, I'm so happy I'm not them. In this film you almost forget the wheelchairs at the end and you actually feel (for them). The place gets smaller between you and them."

The Last Mogul profiles Hollywood legend Lew Wasserman

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

He was a self-styled "pencil pusher." Lew Wasserman, the legendary Hollywood mover and shaker, was, of course, engaging in hyperbole when he described himself so modestly. But he could afford to be disengenuous.

Wasserman, who died three years ago after an illustrious career as chairman and chief executive officer of the Music Corporation of America (MCA) and Universal Studios, is the subject of a bright new documentary.

The Last Mogul: The Life and Times of Lew Wasserman, written and directed by Toronto filmmaker Barry Avrich, opens on July 29 at the Cumberland Cinemas. Avrich's portrait pulls no punches. Wasserman is depicted as a tough-as-nails deal maker who had mob connections and used them to full effect.

At a dinner in his honour, Johnny Carson, the late-night talk-show host, put it best when he quipped, "There's only one reason, ladies and gentlemen, why we're here to pay tribute to Lew Wasserman… fear."

For close to six decades, Wasserman – the son of Russian Jewish immigrants who settled in America in 1907 – was the quintessential Hollywood titan.

But his origins were modest. He was raised in the mean, crime-ridden tenements of Cleveland's redlight district. While still in school, he worked as an usher in a burlesque theatre and booked bands for high school dances.

Jules Stein, his boss and mentor for 45 years, was impressed with his savvy, and hired him as a publicist for his company, MCA. By 1938, MCA managed 90 per cent of the bands in the United States.

Promoted to agent, Wasserman was dispatched to New York City. But finding Manhattan uncongenial, he went to Los Angeles in 1939. In a classic rags-to-riches story, he became the most powerful agent in Hollywood, managing the careers of some 300 actors from Jimmy Stewart to Bette Davis.

Wasserman toiled long and hard to dispel the image of agents as unsavoury characters. He dressed like a London banker, conveyed gravitas and gave the impression of being an accountant.

Though soft-spoken and courteous, he had a volcanic temper. If crossed or dissatisfied with an employee's performance, he could foam at the mouth and rant and rave. Taking pains to keep his name out of newspapers, he strongly believed that publicity was exclusively for his stable of clients.

A visionary, Wasserman recognized early on that television would be extremely lucrative. As a producer, he supplied the TV networks with a succession of popular prime-time shows, from Dragnet and Roots to Alfred Hitchcock Presents and Rich Man, Poor Man.

"He saw clearly into the future," observes Jack Valenti, the longtime president of the powerful Hollywood lobby organization, the Motion Picture Association, and one of the interviewees who offers insights into Wasserman's personality.

Never resting on his laurels, he purchased Paramount's treasure trove of pre-1950 films and leased them to the networks for a tidy profit.

In another brilliant stroke, he and his associates bought Universal's lot, complete with sound stages, and then manoeuvred to acquire the entire studio. Universal churned out its share of clunkers, but also came up with hits such as Airport (supposedly the first "disaster" movie), The Sting, American Graffiti and Jaws.

Yet Wasserman was hardly faultless. He turned down opportunities to make Star Wars and Raiders of the Lost Ark and passed on pay-TV.

A slippery operator whom fellow moguls apparently considered shady and crude, Wasserman dodged a series of anti-trust suits filed by the U.S. government. In one instance, however, he had to submit to the dictates of Washington and close down MCA's talent agency.

Nevertheless, Wasserman ruled the roost. "He had the town by the scrotum," comments Peter Bart, the editor of Variety. Meanwhile, Wasserman's shrewd wife, Edie, became a renowned figure in Hollywood society.

Wasserman bought labour peace with the unions by cultivating a relationship with Ronald Reagan, the president of the Screen Actors Guild and the future president of the United States, and by consorting with Sidney Korshak, the reclusive lawyer who allegedly had ties with the underworld.

To fend off more anti-trust suits, he forged links with influential politicians in the Democratic party, notably Lyndon Baines Johnson.

Avrich suggests that Wasserman's biggest blunder was selling MCA to Sony. The transaction marginalized him. He was further weakened by Edgar Bronfman's takeover of MCA.

By the late 1990s, as a new generation of wheeler-dealers bypassed him, Wasserman had had his day in the sun. But even they knew that Lew Wasserman was a true-blue legend, a point The Last Mogul constantly underlines.

Play set in wartime Poland opens at Brampton festival

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Sara's Cave, an award-winning play exploring humanity and lack of humanity in World War II Poland, is part of the City of Brampton's second annual NewWorks Playwright Festival.

The play, recommended for those 14 years old and over, opens on July 21 and runs until August 3 at the Heritage Theatre.

"What I love about Sara's Cave is that it brings together disparate elements in World War II Poland, literally under one roof, as all the characters struggle with the war from their own perspective," says Cayle Chernin, who plays two roles in the play.

Sara's Cave has won several playwriting competitions, including the Jewish Canadian Playwriting Competition in 2001 and the Canadian National Playwriting Competition in 1993. As well, it made it to the final rounds in the New York Joyce Dutka Arts Foundation playwriting competition in 2002.

"I think Donald Molnar has delivered an important treatment of this crucial subject that, as we know, the world has yet to come to terms with," Chernin says. "And we are fortunate to have Jack Messinger back in Canada after many successful years directing in Israel."

In Sara's Cave, a young Polish woman hides a Jewish family in her root cellar, while, at the same time, she has been ordered to provide lodging for two German officers, who live upstairs in the house.

While one officer struggles with his conscience over his role in the war, the other tries to push him over the edge.

Chernin says, "I'm excited about this project and particularly about the specific challenge it affords me as an actor because I play two very different roles.

"I hope this play will travel and be seen beyond the upcoming production."

Tickets for Sara's Cave are $20. The theatre is wheelchair accessible For more information, call 905-874-2800.

This summer marks the 900th anniversary of the death of Rashi (1040-1105), the revered biblical and talmudic commentator whose name is an acronym for Rabbi Shlomo son of Yitzhak. He lived in Troyes, ancient capital of the Champagne region of France, known today for its high, narrow streets of restored medieval houses, elegant churches and a Gothic cathedral.

Several half-timbered houses in the Jewish quarter survived the fire of 1524 and they, along with the rebuilt synagogue and the Rashi Institute on rue Brunnevel, are featured in several Rashi walking tours this summer. An exhibition on Troyes' famed medieval Jewish sage and the town's Jews in the Middle Ages is on view until early September.

A winemaker by trade, Rashi was educated in the famous Jewish academies of Worms and Mayence, made several trips abroad and returned to Troyes at 25. His learned writings contributed to a cultural rebirth that spread from the Champagne region across Europe in the 11th century. His biblical and talmudic commentaries "became so popular that there are now more than 200 commentaries on his commentary," according to the Jewish Virtual Library web site.

Rosh Hashanah in Harbin: Participants are being sought for Rosh Hashanah observances in Harbin, China. Howard Elias, who last year led a group that brought in the Jewish New Year in Yangon, Myanmar (formerly Rangoon, Burma), says he will request permission for the group to use the recently renovated Harbin New Synagogue, built in 1921 and the largest in the Far East. "So far, we have about six men and six women, but we need 10 men to make a minyan," he advises.

Some 25,000 Jews lived in Harbin in the 1920s, making it the largest Jewish community then in the Far East. Few remain today, but the city is full of reminders of the once-thriving community. Elias, who runs the Hong Kong Jewish Film Festival, reckons there probably hasn't been a Rosh Hashanah celebrated in Harbin since the 1950s.

"As in the past, Chabad will provide us with a rabbi and we'll bring kosher food with us from either [Hong Kong] or Beijing," he writes, adding that he's been researching flights from Hong Kong and hotels for the group. Phone 852-9-102-5410, e-mail info@hkjewishfilmfest.org

Cruise Offers Jewish Land Excursions: A two-day Jewish-themed land excursion to Krakow and Auschwitz has been added as an option to various Baltic and Mediterranean itineraries offered by Crystal Cruises through October. Guests may also visit sites of Jewish historical significance at St. Petersburg, Gdansk, Berlin, Venice, Dublin and other ports of call. The specialized shore excursions are hosted by experts on Jewish heritage and European history. 866-446-6625, www.crystalcruises.com

Eye on Arts

NEW SPIELBERG PROJECT AROUSES JEWISH WORRIES

On the day War of the Worlds opened in theatres across North America, director Steven Spielberg was not sitting around watching box office numbers. Instead he was starting a new project about another war – fully terrestrial this time, but seemingly no less fierce.

Vengeance, currently being shot in Malta, tells the story of the Mossad's alleged counter-terrorism campaign against the PLO terrorists who slaughtered 11 Israeli athletes at the Munich Olympics of 1972. The script is reportedly based on the best-selling 1984 book by Toronto author (and now National Post columnist) George Jonas, which reads like a taut political thriller but has proven controversial because much of its plot is indistinguishable from fiction. Maclean's purchased rights to an excerpt at the time but ultimately refused to run it because its supposed facts could not be verified.

As Jonas himself explained: "Though I was inventing nothing, I could not hope to come up to the rigorous standards of the historian." His primary source was a disgruntled former Mossad agent dubbed "Avner," but the head of the Mossad told the New York Times that Avner was a fake who had never belonged to the Israeli intelligence service. None of that hurt book sales, though. It was regarded as a top Canadian publishing sensation of 1984.

While several retired Mossad agents have publicly wondered why they were not consulted on the project, Spielberg spokesperson Marvin Levy told Reuters last week that the film was being built "from many, many sources" and would present a balanced view. However, the news that anti-Zionist playwright Tony Kushner (Angels in America) is a principal scriptwriter has prompted fears that the result, likely to be seen by millions, will be antagonistic to Israel.

Internet commentator Gerald Honigman posted a long screed on June 23 expressing huge doubts about the venture, and incredulity that the director of Schindler's List "will turn out to be just another Jewish Michael Moore." Taking the opposite view, legendary Israeli actress Gila Almagor, who plays the mother of a Mossad hit man in the film, last week denied the film will harm the Jewish state.

Spielberg is being opaque about his intentions, as when he told USA Today that he was drawn to the venture because it gives him a chance to explore his Jewish faith and his fear of terrorism. For better or for worse, the film is due to open in theatres in December.

Names in the News: The London Jewish Chronicle recently interviewed Abraham Sutzkever, the celebrated Yiddish poet, as part of a story on Vilna's heroic wartime "paper brigade." Consisting of a group of Jewish writers, scholars and partisans, including Sutzkever, the brigade saved a huge trove of Jewish books and documents from Nazi expropriation and destruction. The cultural trove later became part of the famed YIVO collection in New York.

The 92-year-old resident of a Tel Aviv nursing home was described as "the last survivor of Vilna's golden age of Yiddish poetry." He was centrally involved in the rescue of the books, which included Theodor Herzl's diary and other important works. He recounted that Kol Nidrei, his long poem on the tragedy of Vilna's Jews, was smuggled to Moscow and published, prompting some Russians to rescue him by private plane.

"What we did in Vilna was for the love of the Jewish people," he said. "Even though I was in the ghetto and the Germans killed my friends and my mother, I was never jealous of the goyim outside. I was always proud of being a Jew."

By LARA GREENBERG

Zimbabwe born Ethel Stern is proud and protective of the ostrich eggs she paints, and considers each and every one her child.

Stern, who immigrated to Canada from South Africa in 1996, began painting eggs in 1989 as a break from her first love and primary medium, sculpture.

"I just have to create something every day, and my art ensures that I do that," she said.

Today, Stern has a collection of eggs, all painted in Toronto, and she sells to the public. She also enjoys doing commissioned work, in which she will paint an egg with a design that picks up the theme of the home or room that it will be displayed in.

She loves masks and decorates many of her eggs with them; however, she also loves ethnic themes and has used African and Japanese ideas and experimented with different colours and designs, going from extremes like Explosion, an egg painted with bright and vibrant colours, to her William Morris in black and white.

She has also done some eggs with Judaic themes.

Stern names all her eggs and paints the names at the bottom with her signature E. Hatchuel, which is her maiden and professional name.

So far, people have bought the eggs as bat mitzvah presents, wedding presents (a "nest egg," as somebody commented) and ornaments for their own homes, but Stern says these eggs can be given on virtually any occasion.

She encourages all buyers to try to find an interesting stand for their eggs, but most importantly, to put them in a safe place where there is minimal chance of breakage.

One egg usually takes her about three or four days, because the paint takes time to dry before a protective varnish can be applied. Some eggs, though, have taken four weeks of two to three hours a painting session.

As for the painting methods and paint types she uses, Stern says, "That's my secret."

Stern buys all her eggs from Oudsthoorn in South Africa. When she lived there, she would buy them herself, but now she relies on her son, Andrew, who is still living there, to buy eggs for her, and either bring them to Toronto himself or send them with other people.

Every egg is emptied and cleaned before leaving South Africa, so that clearing them at customs has not been a problem.

Having studied in London, after graduation, Stern went to a technical college where she had two years of intensive art training and was accepted into the Royal College of Art.

With the war approaching, however, she was unable to take up that opportunity and came to South Africa instead, at the age of 19 or 20.

By working with a well-known South African sculptor, Herman Wald, in his studio Stern managed to learn a lot about sculpting.

Stern says the direction of her art has always been surrealistic and abstract, but she also does portrait painting, as a discipline.

While in Johannesburg she illustrated three children's books, two history books on South Africa and some Yiddish poetry.

"But," she says, "I also brought up my children and they were and are my best creations."

U.S. group to certify mohelim

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A volunteer organization consisting of rabbis and medical practitioners has been established in the United States to certify mohelim who perform ritual circumcisions.

The American Board of Ritual Circumcisions was founded recently in New York, and in its first two to three weeks of operation, it has certified 28 mohelim, said Rabbi Romi Cohn, chair of the board's executive committee. None of the mohelim work in Canada, though Rabbi Cohn suggested Canadian mohelim may one day wish to take advantage of the certification credential.

The board was established to address concerns that unqualified mohelim were treating the ritual strictly "as a business" and did not bring sufficient levels of halachic and medical expertise to the practice, Rabbi Cohn said.

Some mohelim even employed "cruel instruments," such as clamps, which caused unnecessary pain to the infant. The goal of the board is to certify mohelim who use pain-free techniques, including a local anesthetizing ointment, during the procedure, he said.

Cohn, a Holocaust survivor who has circumcised thousands of boys and young men, said the board will ensure the ritual is conducted in compliance with Halachah and with the best medical practices. However, the board will not disqualify mohelim who employ metzitzah b'peh, a practice that has been linked to the transmission of disease, including herpes, to infants from an infected mohel.

This practice, which involves the oral suction of the penis after the foreskin is removed, is part of a brit milah [ritual circumcision] and cannot be abandoned. "The ritual does require metzitzah b'peh," Rabbi Cohn said. The mohel must be tested for diseases such as hepatitis B, tuberculosis, HIV/AIDS and herpes, and he must be "absolutely certain" he has no illness that might be transmitted during the procedure, he added.

The decision to establish the board was not connected in any way to a report published last summer in the journal Pediatrics by a group of Canadian and Israeli medical researchers who recommended a sterile glass tube be used instead of metzitzah b'peh, nor to an incident last fall in which a New York mohel was linked to the herpes death of one of two twins he had circumcised.

The researchers found eight babies who were infected with the herpes virus likely contracted their illnesses through oral metzitzah. One of the infants was born in Toronto.

Rabbi Cohn said creation of the board has been in the planning stages for almost two years – predating the report – and was meant to address admitted shortcomings in the circumcision procedure, though not ones caused by oral suction.

Rabbi Cohn said the board's medical advisory council includes prominent physicians and a roster of highly regarded rabbinic sages.

The rationale for the board's decision to certify mohelim who perform oral metzitzah appears similar to a statement issued by Toronto's Vaad Harabonim in 1994, after an infant was infected with herpes. The Vaad Harabonim stated, "There is no clinical basis in ceasing to perform metzitzah b'peh." However, the rabbinical council also said if the mohel exhibits cold sores, lesions or flu, oral metzitzah should be avoided, Rabbi Cohn added.

However, the Pediatrics report concluded, "Our findings provide evidence that ritual Jewish circumcision with oral metzitzah may cause oral-genital transmission of HSV (herpes) infection, resulting in clinical disease… Furthermore, oral suction may not only endanger the child but also may expose the mohel to human immunodeficiency virus or hepatitis B from infected infants. The same conclusion that led the talmudic sages once to establish the custom of metzitzah for the sake of the infant could now be applied to persuade the mohel to use instrumental suction."

Dr. Rochelle Schwartz, who has performed ritual circumcisions for nine years, said there are safer ways of performing metzitzah than by using the mouth. "It's really very unhygienic."

The mouth, she continued, is loaded with bacteria and most mohelim would be unaware if they are developing a cold sore.

Canada wins gold at Maccabiah

CJN News Services

TEL AVIV — Canada added three gold medals – two in 10-pin bowling and one in karate – by the end of last week, increasing its total medal count to 23 at the 17th Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Newmarket bowler Lisa Abush, who had never won a gold medal in four previous trips to the Maccabiah Games, stunned a crowd with a solid performance to win the open women's singles title with 1,163 pins.

"It's quite the thing when they put a gold medal around your neck," said Abush, clutching the award after finishing ahead of 21 others in the six rounds of competition. "I just kept trying and trying, hoping that one day my big dream would come true. I will cherish this forever."

About one hour later, Montreal's Hirsh Schnayer teamed with Howard Skulnik of Mississauga to win a gold medal in the open men's doubles 10-pin bowling competition.

Thornhill's Anastasia Shchipillo was golden in the karate 53-kilos-and-under kumite, bringing the karate team's medal total to 10 in two days. In the open women's kata class, Canada won a team bronze medal. In kata, individual, Jamie Yamanaka of Markham won a gold medal, while teammate Shchipillo won the bronze.

High hopes for Canada on the hardwood faded quickly as the open men's basketball team lost a 77-74 heartbreaker in overtime to France. The loss, Canada's second after an opening round defeat to the United States, dropped them out of the medal round. Alex Bougaieff, a six-foot-10 forward from Trois Rivieres who has played pro in Italy, scored a game-high 28 points.

In a boys' youth game, undefeated Canada went on a 25-7 scoring spree in the final eight minutes to beat Australia 66-49 for its third consecutive win. Vancouver's Blake Poritz scored 20 points for Canada, while Jared Mintz of Toronto added 17.

In junior girls' basketball, Canada advanced to the final four against Israel despite a 60-52 loss to the United States. Vicky Hadid of Montreal scored 14 for Canada, now 2-1 in tournament play, while Leeor Handman of Edmonton tossed in 10.

After losing to the United States in the tournament opener, Canada's softball team has crushed opposing teams in five consecutive games, including a 10-1 win over Mexico late last week. Steven Goldsmith of Toronto hit a grand slam and batted in six runs for the winners, while pitcher Jason Dinetz, from Thornhill, improved to 3-0. In the women's competition, the United States thumped Canada 14-1.

Canada finally figured out how to beat the United States in men's baseball. Montreal pitcher Richard Leibovitch gave up seven hits in a 9-3 win – Canada's first in three games against the United States in round-robin games. Toronto's Alex Day hit a two-run home run for the winners.

Ari Lantos from Toronto and Marshall Young of Calgary each scored twice as Canada thumped South Africa 10-2 in water polo. It was Canada's first game of the tournament.

Medal hopes for Canada's open men's soccer team ended following a 3-1 loss to the Netherlands. Thornhill's Shmuel Hazan, who had scored the only goal of the game in an upset of defending champion Argentina, scored Canada's only goal in the loss.

South Africa was the latest to defeat Canada, suffering from a rash of injuries, in an open men's rugby match. South Africa won 37-7 while Canada has yet to win a game in four starts.

In other Maccabiah competition last week, Canada's track and field athletes reached the medal podium seven times.

Judith Elfassy-Navier (Toronto) won a silver medal in the open girls' 1,500 metres, finishing in 4.38.00. Deborah Lightman (Toronto) won a bronze in the open girls' 400 metres in a time of 1.01.27. Emma Pink (Halifax) won a bronze in the junior girls' 100 metres timed in a personal best 12.85, while Roy Argand (Halifax) also took home a bronze in the junior boys' 400 metres timed in 52.87.

In open men's competition, Geoff Rosenbaum of Winnipeg earned a bronze medal in the 110-metre hurdles with a time of 15.30, while Montrealer Josh Wolfe finished with bronze in the 800-metres with a time of 1.52.80.

Despite fielding one of the smallest gymnastics teams at the Maccabiah Games – only three athletes and all from Montreal – it was the gymnasts who won Canada's first individual and team medals. Danielle Goldman won a bronze for her overall performance while the team claimed a silver medal.

Other results:

Judo:

Open Men: Under 73kg – Aaron Pfeffer, Winnipeg, bronze medal

Squash:

Israel beat Canada 3-0 in squash, but the Canadians still won a bronze medal.

Swimming:

200m freestyle – Adam Eilath, Thornhill, 2:02.10, bronze medal

Entrepreneur Sidney Greenberg was inducted into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame last week. Greenberg, a longtime supporter of Maccabi Canada, joins boxing promoter Irv Ungerma and football legends Lew Hayman and Syd Halter in the hall. In a special ceremony, Greenberg was recognized for having "made significant contributions to society through sport."

In other developments, Toronto businessman Walter Arbib created quite a bit of excitement – including recognition from Israel's Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert – after his company donated $250,000 in medical supplies to the Tel Hashomer Hospital in Ramat Gan.

Toronto's first dodgeball league holds finals

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

In a league that has gained popularity because of a Ben Stiller comedy called Dodgeball, two teams competed for the first Toronto Dodgeball Association (TDA) championship last Sunday.

Team Discovery Channel edged out Family Ties 3-2 in the finals after taking a 2-0 lead in a best of five series.

Since May, Dodgeball's captain Jonathan Roth and his team, along with five other adult teams and six youth teams, have been playing every Sunday at the York Mills Arena in Toronto.

His team, which was ranked second at the end of the regular season, failed to make the finals.

"It was very disappointing. We expected to make it, but we didn't. We had very high hopes but we didn't play as well as we had hoped," the 17-year-old captain said.

While this isn't a Jewish league, there are two all-Jewish teams. In fact, the teams have even developed a playful rivalry as Roth's team, the Dodgeballs, is made up of Ashkenazi Jews, and the other, Family Ties, is Sephardi.

Team Discovery Channel

With the short season over, and a new season set to begin on July 8 and 9, men, women and children of all ages are encouraged to join. Players are placed in divisions based on age.

According to the Association's website, the TDA, created by Lorne Kurtz, is "Toronto's first and only organized Dodgeball League."

"I started the league out of the inspiration and experience I got from running the University of Western's charity dodgeball tournament for the Tsunami disaster," Kurtz said.

He added that based on the positive feedback, he decided to team up with his brother Michael, who had been involved in starting an inline hockey league in 1996.

Roth is confident that the young league will continue to gain popularity because of the hit comedy Dodgeball that hit movie theatres last summer.

"We'd all seen the movie and thought it'd be interesting [to play in a dodgeball league]. People who've seen the movie are more likely to join than those who haven't," Roth said.

"The movie, Dodgeball created a lot of interest so we definitely worked off of that and it turned out to be a great success," Kurtz said.

A part of the movie that the TDA incorporated into their league is that each team is encouraged to dress up in costume, just like the teams in the movie did.

"At the end of the season, the team with the best costume wins a prize," Roth said.

It costs $70 per person to join the league. For more information, call 416-787-2120.

The age of innocence

The first thing I heard on the news when I woke one day two weeks ago was that there had been a terrorist attack in London, England. Four bombs rudely exploded right in the city – three in the underground tube and one on a red double-decker bus.

On a recent trip to London, I happily rode a double-decker bus. The last thing on my mind were thoughts of terrorism; I was much more concerned with shopping and hanging out with my friends.

By MIRIAM PORTER

I take public transit in Toronto almost daily, and I don't think twice about the possible dangers there either. I just assume I will arrive at my destination alive. Unfortunately, the reality of the London events made me question my own safety on the subway the next day.

As well, when I was travelling on city buses in Israel last year I was aware of every single person around me. I almost ran out the back door when a passenger entered carrying a large box – which I later learned was filled only with food. Living in a city where terrorism exists daily is a very different way of life.

The horrific facts on the cruel London attacks unravelled throughout the next few days and it just kept getting worse, with headlines such as "Over 50 dead and over 700 injured" and "Canada may be next." I had flashbacks to the horrors of 911. As a Jew, of course, I also thought about Israel.

Later that day, I met a girlfriend at a nearby park. All around us children played joyously. Some of them ran in and out of the water fountain screaming with delight, others were laughing as they flew down a dazzling yellow slide into a pile of warm sand. Two little boys made sand castles with bright plastic toys.

The toddlers had one thing in common – innocence. How lucky they are not to know what terrorism means. I envied their lack of knowledge.

My girlfriend and I have known each other more than half our lives. That day we tried to think back to a time before we knew what evil really was.

Ironically, we both remembered that our parents had taught us at young ages never to get in a car with strangers. Both sets of parents had also scared us into promising we would never accept candy from anyone we didn't recognize – but at the time we had no idea why.

It wasn't until I started to get older that I understood the severity and harsh repercussions of what could happen if I got into a car with a stranger.

I wonder when a child's perception of the world begins to change. Do they just wake up one morning and know that evil exists? At what age does this occur? Five? Ten? The teens?

The children living in Israel grow up with different realities than the children we saw in the park. The truth is that Israeli children see soldiers carrying guns all the time, and most Canadian children have only seen toy guns that hold water.

But when do children worldwide become aware that others their age don't have enough food to eat? That some kids live on the streets? That child abuse exists? That innocent babies in African villages are contracting HIV/AIDS? That the rainforests are disappearing? That the meat on their plate did not grow on a tree? When do they realize the real reasons behind not getting into a stranger's car?

My friend and I continued to watch the children playing on the swings and hoped it would be many, many years before they understand that their safe and happy world could be destroyed in a matter of seconds by selfish and barbaric terrorists.

My prayers are with the victims in London and their families. And my heart goes out to the children there who learned way too soon in their young lives what terrorism means.

BOURBON-MOLASSES CHICKEN DRUMSTICKS

1/4 c parve margarine	2 tsp. mustard
1 c minced onion	3/4 tsp. ground black pepper, divided in half
1 c ketchup	1/4 tsp chili powder
1/4 c molasses	1/4 c bourbon
2 tblsp. (packed) brown sugar	1 1/2 tsp coarse kosher salt
1 1/2 tblsp. Worcestershire sauce	12 chicken drumsticks

Melt margarine in saucepan. Add onion; sauté until soft. Add next 5 ingredients. Add 1/2 pepper and chili powder. Reduce heat; simmer 15 mins. Stir in bourbon and molasses; cook, about 3 mins. Season with salt. Loosen skin on drumsticks. Mix remaining salt and pepper in bowl and rub under skin without tearing skin. Cover; let stand at room temperature 30 mins.

Prepare bbq (med. heat). Grill drumsticks until skin is crisp and juices run clear, turning to cook all sides. Transfer 1/2 c. bbq sauce to small bowl; reserve. Brush drumsticks with remaining sauce and cook 3 mins. longer. Transfer drumsticks to platter and serve with reserved sauce. Yield: 4 servings.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Voted the funniest girl in her high school class, Beatrice Arthur made her reputation largely in two TV situation comedies, Maude and The Golden Girls.

Born Bernice Frankel in 1923, Bea Arthur grew up in Cambridge, Md. She graduated from the Franklin Institute of Sciences and Art in Philadelphia, and after serving in the U.S. Marines during World War II, she moved to New York to study acting.

Arthur, a statuesque 5 foot 10, had an up and down acting career for years and was not especially well known, even after winning a Tony Award for her performance in Mame in 1966.

In fact, with an ailing husband, Arthur became the breadwinner of the family by playing Yente the Matchmaker in Fiddler on the Roof, a role she performed for several years.

"Gene told him what he loved about me and what he hated about me, and that's how Maude was born," Arthur has said.

Her next success was the series The Golden Girls, in which Arthur was the dominant figure of four older women – including Betty White, Rue McLanahan and Estelle Getty.

Responding to stories alleging feuds among the quartet during production, Arthur stated: "We really do get along. We don't socialize of course… but we are professionals who respect one another."

Arthur dropped out of the show in 1992 when her character married. She felt this was a graceful way of retiring from the series.

"It's better than having me killed off in a car wreck."

Community loneliness: readers respond

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

A few weeks ago, I wrote a second column in a continuing series about the potential loneliness involved in becoming a member of the Toronto Jewish community. My argument was that it can be arduous to settle into our town and that it would behoove us to institutionalize programs to create a higher quality and more widespread approach to hospitality and chesed (kindness).

URBAN WRITER

I was greatly intrigued by the e-mails I received in response, and I wanted to share some of them with you to further the discussion on this issue, and to reiterate that clearly there are pockets, neighbourhoods, synagogues and individuals who flourish in the area of outreach.

One individual wrote that she agrees "this problem exists. However, if anyone is looking for a 'a home-away-from-home experience' then send them to my shul – the Village Shul – everyone is welcome. As for seniors, perhaps it is time for shuls to start extending invitations to them, not only to families! Let everyone begin by adopting a new family or senior."

Another person, born in Toronto but now living abroad, wrote that, in his estimation, there are three reasons why it's hard to make it as a new member of the Toronto Jewish community.

One: "Toronto is the only reasonably good place for an identified Jew to live in Canada, so Toronto Jews don't leave the way American Jews will… therefore, Toronto Jews have all their friends, family, in-laws and business associates in their hometown, and just don't have time for even the people they want to be with. They also don't relate to what it's like to be a newcomer. It's a foreign concept."

Two: "Toronto culture in general is not warm. Montreal Jews are warmer because Montreal is warmer… René Lévesque [the late separatist premier of Quebec] is the best thing that ever happened to the Toronto Jewish community, because he warmed it up with Montrealers."

Three: "Money is important in Toronto; it's a financial centre. Wherever people are preoccupied with money, they are self-concerned. Chicago and Los Angeles are much warmer than New York City for the same reason."

I also received e-mail from a downtown Jew who wrote that his absorption into the Toronto Jewish community was dramatically different than what I described, and he attributed his positive experiences to the love and friendship extended to him by the members – and especially the rabbi, Shmuel Spero – of Congregation Anshei Minsk.

Finally, a dear friend who moved here from overseas told me that "as a newcomer… I have come to accept that this [difficulty of making friends] is the Toronto reality. I attribute it to many causes, such as strong families that don't need anything outside their home, to busy-ness and so on, but feel it must go deeper… I have come to attribute this coldness to a kind of spiritual emptiness, or, further, to a spiritual/cultural materialism."

She then continued, with the utmost of respect, to say that in her estimation, I am a part of the problem I described, and that she began at some point to feel guilty about inviting me over, as I "always seemed too busy, and it seemed such a chore for you to fit us in." (The experience of writing – particularly the lessons I must learn from my own sermonizing– can be painful, yet constructive.)

I believe that we Toronto Jews have the ability to strengthen our resolve to make sure we are the definitive community when it comes to warmth and love for our newest neighbours, seniors and anyone else looking for a friend and a place to hang their hat.

Sharon repeats call for French aliyah

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has once again urged members of the French Jewish community to immigrate to Israel.

"Just as I call on Jews the world over to move to Israel, I call on you as well," he said to hundreds of representatives of France's Jewish community last Thursday.

Please see related story on page 23

A year ago, a similar statement by Sharon provoked a diplomatic storm and a harsh protest from the Élysée Palace. This time, Sharon praised French President Jacques Chirac's resolute action to fight anti-Semitism.

However, he said the "central means to ensure the future of the Jewish people is aliyah to the land of Israel," adding, "I hope you all rush to start packing your bags.

"The future of the Jewish people also depends on Israel's character as a Jewish and democratic state, and we initiated the disengagement plan in this spirit.

"This may have been the most difficult decision I made in my life, but it is vital for Israel's future," he said.

Sharon said the Mideast's main problem is the refusal of the Arab world to recognize the right of the Jewish people to a state in the "cradle of its birth," adding that this was not a reason to stop the diplomatic process, but rather to act with caution and "not to trust anyone."

Regarding Israel's Arab minority, Sharon said, "Israel has 5.5 million Jews and just over a million Palestinian Arabs who are Israeli citizens.

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

BERLIN — For the first time, the Temple Scroll, one of seven Dead Sea scrolls found in Qumran in 1947, is being displayed publicly.

The 3.6-metre section of the scroll, which concerns matters relating to the Temple as revealed to Moses, has never been shown before, not even at the Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

It's part of the exhibition "The New Hebrews: A Century of Art in Israel," running until Sept. 5 at the Martin-Groupius Bau museum in Berlin to mark the 40th anniversary of German and Israeli diplomatic relations. It's being co-presented by the Israel Museum and the Berliner Festpiele.

The scroll, something of an anomaly in an exhibit dealing with 100 years of Jewish art, may have been made the main feature to draw people in.

"The Qumran scrolls were very important to the process of Israeli identity, since most Israelis are secular and they live in Israel, not because God promised them the land, but because their ancestors were living there," says the exhibition's curator, Doreet LeVitte Harten. "The discovery of this scroll gave a kind of legitimation for the continuity they were looking for. With the discovery of

Praise for Sharon

TORONTO — Canadian Friends of Peace Now (CFPN) praised Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for having police block anti-disengagement protesters from reaching a large rally near Gaza last month after they said they wouldn't rule out using violence to reach settlements. CFPN Toronto president Av Sohn said, "Extremists must not be allowed to challenge the rule of law and thwart the democratic will of the Israeli majority." The group also said this month's pullout from Gaza is threatened by the Palestinian Authority's reluctance to stop terror.

Israel Poster Contest

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel Committee is seeking entries from Canadians 14 and up for an Israel poster competition. Entries "should present a fresh image of Israel, be thought-provoking and visually engaging" and "highlight the common values of Canadians and Israelis or showcase Israel's innovations," the CIC said. First prize is $1,000 (US) in State of Israel Bonds. Deadline is Aug. 31. Details at www.cicweb.ca/postercompetition.

Suspect May Go Free

VANCOUVER — A terror suspect who allegedly planned to use a gasoline truck to bomb haredi Jews in Montreal's Outremont area will likely be set free because another member of the terror cell he is alleged to be part of won't testify against him, U.S. authorities say. Samir Ait Mohamed has been in jail in Vancouver since his arrest in 2001. He is alleged to be an associate of Ahmed Ressam, who was sentenced last week to 22 years in jail for a plot to bomb Los Angeles International Airport before the millennium. U.S. prosecutors say the extradition effort and case against Mohamed will collapse without Ressam's help. He stopped co-operating with authorities in 2003, Canadian Press reported.

Sheik Probe Widens

VANCOUVER — The investigation into whether a Vancouver Muslim cleric's slurs against Jews violated hate laws has been turned over to the Integrated National Security Enforcement Team, which combines resources from the RCMP, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and local police, the RCMP said last month. South African-born Sheik Younus Kathrada, who is linked to the Dar al-Madinah Islamic Society, has called Jews "brothers of monkeys and swine" in lectures and online, and urged Muslims to wage a holy war against non-believers.

Pipes Gets Formal Apology for Hitler Slur

TORONTO — The Canadian Islamic Congress apologized to scholar Daniel Pipes for saying he wanted to put North American Muslims into concentration camps.

Stan Fisher, an attorney with the law firm Heenan Blaikie, confirmed he sent a libel notice on Pipes' behalf to the Canadian Islamic Congress after its website ran an article by Wahida Valiante accusing the Philadelphia-based scholar of wanting to employ "Hitlerian" tactics against Muslims.

"The Canadian Islamic Congress and Ms. Valiante apologize without reservation and retract remarks in the column that suggest that Dr. Daniel Pipes is a follower of Hitler or that he uses the tactics of Hitler or that he wants to ethnically cleanse America of its Muslim presence," read the apology, which appeared briefly on the group's website in June.

The group also paid Pipes' legal costs and made a charitable donation in his name. In a July 19 National Post column, Pipes, who heads the Middle East Forum think tank, said his victory was "unprecedented" and "offers a small but important step in blocking the advance of Islamic extremism."

KPMG to Sue Manor

TORONTO — KPMG said it will sue Boaz Manor, the Israeli co-founder of the $700-million hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management, in Israel after he ignored a court order to return $3.1 million, Bloomberg News reported. Manor fled to Israel after the Ontario Securities Commission forced Portus into receivership in March and started probing transactions at the three-year-old firm. Manor transferred the $3.1 million from the Turks and Caicos islands to Italy after the OSC froze Portus' accounts. Manor has said he is too sick to talk to KPMG, Portus' receiver, despite pledging to do so. The RCMP said it has opened a criminal probe into Portus.

Zundel Charged

BERLIN — German prosecutors last month charged Holocaust denier and former Toronto resident Ernst Zundel, with inciting racial hatred, four months after Canada deported him. Zundel, a German national, is accused of decades of anti-Semitic activities, including repeated Holocaust denial – a crime in Germany – in print and online. It's unclear when he might face trial. Zundel, arrested in March on arriving in Germany, remains in jail.

Canadian athletes win 59 medals in Israel

While many saw success in the team's 59 total medals, others pointed proudly to the dozens of Canadian personal-best performances against some of the top Jewish athletes in the world.

Of the 55 countries competing, only Israel, the United States and Russia earned more medals than Canada at the Games, held in Israel from July 10 to 21.

Canadian flag-bearer Sharon Fichman of Toronto may have summed it up best for the Canadian team of 400 athletes, coaches and support staff.

Surprisingly, though, it wasn't at the top.

"I represented my religion and my country," she said outside the Jerusalem Tennis Center, minutes after beating highly touted 23-year-old Nicole Ptak of the United States 6-2, 6-2 for the gold medal.

"These Games are not just all about sports, but meeting people, learning about culture and building friendship. Being the No. 1 Jewish female tennis player in the world is also not too shabby."

Fichman confirmed she would be turning pro when she returned to Canada. She is entered in this month's Rogers Cup in Toronto, a tier one event on the World Tennis Association professional tour.

Battling a viral infection and a mild fever in the days leading up to the final, Fichman didn't let up. She finished the singles competition undefeated.

Fichman, who also won a bronze medal in women's doubles, wrapped up the tennis event with a silver in a thrilling finish to the mixed doubles final. She teamed with Oran Belillti of Richmond Hill, Ont., but they lost to a team from South Africa 6-4, 6-7, 7-6.

In other events, Canadian track and field athletes took top spot with 19 medals, including five in the triathlon.

Thornhill, Ont.'s Adam Eilath and Daniel Einhorn of Vancouver, the only Canadians competing in swimming and wrestling respectively, each won a pair of medals. Einhorn won gold in open freestyle wrestling in the 84-kilogram weight class.

"We had a team of quality athletes and it showed," said Allen Gerskup, head of Canada's delegation. "You're up against many elite athletes from around the world and to do so well is a credit to these fine young people, their coaches and families."

London bombs, worldwide worry

From the editor's desk

Just past the midpoint of our seven-hour flight to London two weeks ago, the pilot made an announcement advising the passengers on the mostly empty plane that another "event" had taken place there that day.

By "event," of course, he meant bombings. In fact, the pilot calmly elaborated that there had been four bombs, but added, thankfully, that they had resulted in no injury. We did not know at the time however, that unlike the "event" two weeks prior, the terrorists had actually failed in their attempts at mass murder.

Heathrow Airport was dark, gloomy and mostly devoid of human traffic when we arrived in the late evening.

The next morning, Friday, the lead story in The Times began: "Terror returned to the streets of London yesterday as bombers once again sought to murder, maim and cause mayhem on the capital's transport system."

"Whereas the bombs on July 7 targeted London's commuters at the height of morning rush hour, killing 56 people, yesterday's attacks seemed intended for very different victims: the tourists, shoppers and schoolchildren using the transport system," wrote Ben Macintyre in The Times. That some of the unexploded bombs had been packed with nails and bolts meant that the terrorists had intended to harm as many innocents as possible.

The city was palpably on edge and became progressively edgier throughout the day as details of the failed attacks were disclosed and the chilling realization set in that the four bombers were still at large. The headline in the Saturday newspaper confirmed that the police were in a race to find the bombers before they struck again.

The Times editorialist described the atmosphere. "The hunt for the second wave of bombers has spread across the capital. Main roads have been closed, residents evacuated and a few stations remain shut. The streets echoed to the wail of police sirens. There is a superficial calm. Most people made it manfully into work. But Londoners know that something fundamental has changed."

Though gritty composure was in evidence on all the streets, an unmistakable air of urgency animated officials' actions and statements. It was in this tense, anxious atmosphere of desperate search and feelings of heightened vulnerability, alas, that the police mistakenly shot and killed someone – an electrician from Brazil, as it turned out – at one of the tube stations.

My wife and I were in London to celebrate the wedding of the child of a close friend. Ironically, though not surprisingly, the unceasing focus throughout the weekend on news of the unapprehended terrorists added a certain poignancy to the wedding and an intensity to the joy of our celebration.

Pundits and various experts quarrel over the reasons and the causes for the terrorists' atrocities. But one thing is beyond uncertainty: their aim is to kill people, plain and simple. They don't differentiate between "believers" and "unbelievers" because their real and true targets in places like London, Madrid, New York, Bali, Istanbul, Sharm el Sheikh and Tel Aviv are the symbols, institutions and life-infusing instruments of western society that so offends them.

British Jews are worried, as they should be. As the JTA observed, "The British Jewish community has been disturbed not only by the latest round of bombings but also by the response of the U.K.'s Muslim leadership to the growing threat of fanaticism in its midst.

"The extent of the radicalization was highlighted by the news that nearly a quarter of U.K. Muslims have some sympathy with the feelings and motives of those who carried out the July 7 bombings, according to a poll sponsored by Britain's Daily Telegraph newspaper."

Lord Greville Janner, one of U.K. Jewry's internationally renowned spokesman and president of the Commonwealth Jewish Council, spoke to The CJN last week about the previous week's events. "On the whole, the Jewish community felt as everyone did, concerned about children and family. But it's not just here," he quickly added. "The threat is spreading across the world. It's getting worse and it's going to get worse still. It can happen anywhere."

Janner's voice rose markedly in obvious exasperation as he commented on the efforts in the media and in other quarters to explain if not justify the terrorists' actions. "It [the terrorism] has no logic," he said abruptly. The mayor of London, Ken Livingstone's, statements about western complicity in the London attacks and his comparisons between Hamas and Likud, he said, were simply "a load of total rubbish."

Janner feels a deep attachment to Canadian Jewry. Janner's bar mitzvah was at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue in Montreal during World War II. To Canadian Jews, he says: "Be on guard. Don't take your security for granted. Anyone, anywhere can be at risk. It's a very tough, difficult, dangerous world." The Jewish community needs no convincing of Janner's words. It is the government that must come to see the truth in his warning.

The most recent issue of Azure contains an essay by Shalem Center Senior Fellow, Robert Wistrich, titled Cruel Britannia. The author describes how London became a hotbed of militant Islamic activity. It is eerily timely in light of recent events and I commend it to all readers. It contains many important lessons, if we would but only learn them.

UJA aims to raise extra $10 million by 2008

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's has launched a drive to raise $10 million by 2008, above and beyond its annual fundraising efforts, for Jewish youth in Canada and Israel, the federation's annual leadership retreat heard last month.

Honey Sherman and Warren Kimel, chairs of UJA Federation's Campaign 2006, told about 100 people who attended a presentation at Kimel's cottage in Jackson's Point, a resort area on Lake Simcoe an hour north of Toronto, that it's the community's responsibility to help the disadvantaged by volunteering and donating money.

If the goal of raising the additional $10 million is reached, $3 million will go toward social services in the Toronto area, such as helping the thousands of Jewish families that are living below the poverty line. Another $4 million will be used to assist poverty-stricken families and the growing Ethiopian community in Israel. The last $3 million will be spent on efforts to reconnect Jewish youth with their Jewish identities.

"We are rebuilding a stronger Israel to give many opportunities to help relieve the impact of the last four years of terror and help [young Israelis] optimize their potential. We are helping Jewish youth to live a life led Jewishly, which will strengthen their attachment to the Jewish community at large," Sherman said.

"And finally, we are committed to social justice, caring for the poor and vulnerable here within our own community."

As part of the presentation outlining the campaign, called the Case For Giving, the Jewish Family & Child Service demonstrated how hard it is for a single Jewish mother to make ends meet without the organization's assistance.

Leah Biteolin, an Ethiopian Jew, told an inspiring story of her mother's successful efforts to flee Ethiopia and raise her children in Israel, enduring the threat of being thrown in jail for trying to leave and surviving the deplorable conditions of a refugee camp for six months.

Testimony from alumni of birthright israel and March of the Living was also heard in support of programs that help young Jews renew their connections to their faith.

In a briefing on the political strife in Israel, former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff and former Israeli cabinet minister Amnon Lipkin-Shahak spoke about Israel's upcoming disengagement from Gaza.

He said while most Israelis support the plan, many others have taken issue with the way the pullout is being implemented.

The presentations were meant to drive home the message that volunteers and money would strengthen the Jewish community, both here and abroad.

"It is because of your efforts, your determination and your drive that we as a community are able to change Jewish lives for the better, and together we can and do make a difference," Sherman said.

Former IDF chief of staff defends disengagement

By LARA GREENBERG

Israel is a strong country today and any threat to its existence is shrinking, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, former chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) said while on a visit to Canada recently.

As the featured guest speaker at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's recent leadership retreat in Jackson's Point, Lipkin-Shahak spoke about Israel's pending disengagement from Gaza, including internal Israeli political disputes surrounding the pullout and its possible positive outcomes for Israeli-Palestinian relations.

In an interview with The CJN, he said it's important to remember that the disengagement is not part of the peace process or Israeli-Palestinian dialogue, but rather a decision made by the Israeli government and Knesset.

"The disengagement, which is opposed by not a small number yet supported by many, might open a new window of opportunity if the Israelis and Palestinians use this opportunity to open a new dialogue," he said.

According to Lipkin-Shahak, whether disengagement from Gaza will satisfy the Palestinians is not the right question to be asking, because they will obviously be happy to see the Israelis leave.

The bigger question is whether the present Palestinian leadership, which is speaking out against terrorism and in favour of a return to dialogue, will be strong enough to "impose these ideas" on their people, he said.

Lipkin-Shahak, a born and bred Israeli who was twice awarded the IDF Medal of Valour, lives in Reut and spent most of his life protecting his homeland.

"It was the salary," he joked when asked about his motivation for staying in the army as long as he did.

When he first enlisted in 1962, he didn't think he'd stay for very long, but when he was given the challenging position of young company commander to a group of paratroopers at age 21, he decided to stay another year.

Then came the Six Day War, and after that, Lipkin-Shahak believed it was more important to stay in the army than to go to university.

From then on, one year rolled into another and he moved up the ranks until he succeeded Ehud Barak to become the 15th chief of staff.

It was only after serving in that position, 36 years after entering the IDF, when there was no other position to move up to, did Lipkin-Shahak decide to leave the army. He retired in 1998.

As deputy chief of staff from 1991 to 1995, he headed the Israeli military team that participated in negotiations with the Palestinians on the Gaza-Jericho agreement.

As chief of staff, he met with his Syrian counterpart to start a discussion on security arrangements as part of peace negotiations between the two countries.

After leaving the army, Lipkin-Shahak was elected to the Knesset in 1999 as a member of the Center party in the election that brought Barak, by then leader of the Labour party, to power.

Lipkin-Shahak was named minister of tourism in August 1999 and minister of transport in June 2000. He held both positions until 2001, when he resigned from the Knesset.

He was in Toronto on a fundraising mission as a volunteer for the Friends of Israel Firefighters.

"All the volunteers are trying to help the Israeli firefighters to be better equipped," Lipkin-Shahak said.

About two years ago, the Friends launched an emergency campaign to buy 100 new fire trucks. One of the first gifts was $220,000 from the Toronto Jewish community through Partnership 2000 Toronto-Eilat. The money enabled Israel to buy a fire truck that would later be used in the rescue operation after last year's terror attack on the Taba Hilton in Sinai.

Jane Fonda, the Hollywood actress and social activist, has decided to pick up the pages of an old script. She told a newspaper last week that she was about "to come out." By that, the famous anti-Vietnam advocate meant she would soon be actively lobbying for the U.S. government to pull its troops out of Iraq. She intends to travel the length and breadth of the U.S. by bus, perhaps to emphasize the proletarian and egalitarian poignancy of her message, that the U.S. soldiers must come home.

Her decision undoubtedly stems from the deeply held conviction that the U.S. presence in Iraq is unjust. But Iraq 2005 is not Vietnam 1965. The comparison does not hold, nor should it be made. The enemies of the American (and British and other coalition) fighting forces in Iraq happen also to be the enemies of the vast majority of the Iraqi people themselves. The insurgents, as they are euphemistically called, even slaughter young children playing in the streets, their hands reaching for a windfall of candy from nearby soldiers.

By contrast, the social activist, former Ontario premier Bob Rae has decided to try to help the people of Iraq rebuild their country. He was in Baghdad last month, invited there by Iraqi legislators struggling to write a founding constitution. Despite the very real risk to his own life, Rae believed the cause of Iraq 2005 warranted the risk.

He described to the Globe and Mail how deeply moved and impressed he was by the determination of the Iraqis to bring democracy to their country. "You come away from it all with tremendous admiration for the courage of the people who are sticking at it and moving forward, going forward and dealing with some very difficult issues," he said.

The non-uniformed insurgents are waging brutal war primarily against the fledgling Iraqi parliament, the struggling Iraqi security forces and the non-fighting civilian citizenry. They are a well-directed gang of modern Mideast cutthroats, bringing together, in one nihilistic coalition, the despotic yearnings of former Saddam Hussein loyalists and the fervently anti-western zealotry of Islamic extremists. They are absolutely opposed to the rooting of democracy in Iraq and, as we have seen, will go to any bloody lengths to scorch the earth lest democratic roots take hold.

Individuals like Bob Rae are to be commended for their courage. They bring hope to the beleaguered Iraqi people that perhaps they will not be abandoned in their campaign for freedom. But equally inspiring is that he decided to take a stand on behalf of the electrifying yet humbling notion that Iraq's people also deserve the chance to live free from the fear of harm at the hands of the violent fanatic's hatred.

25 years ago in The CJN

• Canada voted against two anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations. One demanded that Israel withdraw unilaterally from the "occupied territories." The other was a document arising from the World Program of Action on the Status of Women, at the UN Decade of Women Conference in Copenhagen, that equated Zionism with racism and recommended establishing working relations with the PLO.

• UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim was blasted by the Israeli mission to the United Nations for calling for the establishment of a Palestinian state in a speech to the Arab League.

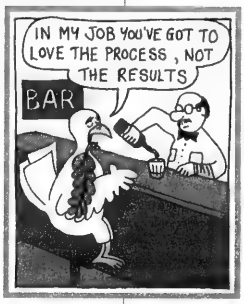
Martin should address terrorism

While British, American, Indian, Israeli, Spanish, Italian and other leaders around the world confront the murderous ideology of Islamic terrorists, the Canadian government and Prime Minister Paul Martin have been largely silent.

Martin's silence and inaction in the face of growing threats from more than 50 terrorist organizations that CSIS has identified as operating in Canada places all Canadians in danger.

While some have suggested that the government is doing all that it can, we at the Canadian Coalition for Democracies believe more can and must be done.

The time has come for Canada's prime minister to show strong leadership in confronting the radical Islamist terrorists and their genocidal ideology before it is too late. He must not allow political correctness or the appeasement of domestic voting blocs to take precedence over the lives of Canadians.



Should the prime minister continue to avoid taking strong action against the terrorist organizations known to be in Canada, he will risk being held responsible if they launch an attack on Canadians or from our soil.

Rochelle Wilner
Senior Vice-President
Canadian Coalition for Democracies, Toronto

The right to protest injustice

In your June 30 editorial ("Disengagement and the Diaspora"), you argue that it is wrong to "undermine the legitimate authority of the duly elected government of Israel." Yet you "do not question the right and even the moral obligation of every Jew to question the course of the actions of the government of Israel." Which one is it? Do we have the right, or don't we?

The right of a just-minded individual to protest injustice is a fundamental precept of both democracy and Judaism. Would you also propose to silence the American civil rights activists in the 1960s who protested against the unjust policies of a democratic government? Would you prohibit the so-called peace activists from criticizing Israel's policy of targeted assassinations and house demolitions, which they view as unjust? One cannot apply a double standard by claiming a right to protest for one's own cause while denying the rights of others to do the same.

You suggest that disengagement is the only way to address the issue of demographics and avoid having to absorb the Palestinians of Gaza into Israel. Surely an investment of more time and energy would bear the fruit of a more logical course of action – one that does not contradict the opinion of every military, security and intelligence expert in Israel.

The disengagement plan places millions of Jewish lives at risk, rewards and encourages unrepentant murderers, punishes those who stand strong for Israel's security, and sows disunity among the Jewish people. It also provides terrorists with a bigger launching pad from which to perpetrate their attacks on innocent Israelis.

Izzy Greenberg
Editor, Exodus Magazine, Toronto

Response to Chivo

The alphabet of insinuating remarks brought against Pope John Paul II by Jack Chivo and published in the The CJN, April 28 ("John Paul II's legacy: 'One step forwards, two steps backwards'") can never serve to tarnish the highly praised and well-deserved reputation this man has taken with him to his grave.

Blessed relief from such minority criticism as Chivo's is easily found in any number of notable Jewish sources, one of which is the International Council of Christians and Jews. Speaking on behalf of the council, its president, following the death of Pope John Paul II, said: "Pope John Paul II took the document of Vatican II Nostra Aetate and its chapter four on the Church's relationship with the Jewish people and made it a centrepiece of his papal ministry. He said more positively than any pope in history regarding the centrality of Judaism to Christian self-understanding. He termed anti-Semitism a sin on a number of occasions and dramatized his commitment to its demise in Christian consciousness by placing his words of apology for anti-Semitism in the church in the Western Wall in Jerusalem. He took the necessary steps to recognize the State of Israel."

It is only because of the valiant contribution of Pope Paul II that Pope Benedict XVI could say, just recently, to members of the World Jewish Congress and the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations that "at the very beginning of my pontificate, I wish to assure you that the Church remains firmly committed, in her catechesis and in every aspect of her life, to implementing the decisive teaching of Nostra Aetate."

In Chivo's litany of negative comments about Pope John Paul II, there is, it seems to me, something more than meets the eye – possibly a reverse form of anti-Semitism against Catholic leadership.

Jews and the cross: an unhappy history

By SALLY F. ZERKER

When I was a child – one brought up in the Jewish Orthodox tradition – it was a staple of my childish, unreflective mind that the cross was a bad thing, and in some ways even a frightening thing. Should a cross be exhibited in my presence, I would automatically turn my eyes away from this baleful item.

As I matured, growing up in a Christian country, I was naturally exposed in both churches and museums to numerous sculptures and paintings depicting Jesus on the cross, so that in time, the cross took on a benign quality for me, as simply the expression of Christian veneration. But I can't say that I had a true understanding of the meaning of the cross for Christianity or for Jews, nor had I ever given it much thought.

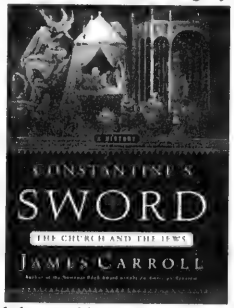
But that all changed when I read James Carroll's book Constantine's Sword, whose subtitle is The Church and the Jews. This is not a new book, but it was new for me when I read it during my vacation in Florida this past winter, and it was through this work that I came to appreciate and understand my youthful reactions to the cross.

Carroll begins his historical narrative of the Church's deplorable record toward the Jews with his sighting of the huge cross that Carmelite nuns had placed in the field near the wall of the Auschwitz concentration camp. For Carroll, an ex-priest and still a devoted Catholic, the cross at Auschwitz was a revelation. He was "seeing the cross in its full and awful truth for the first time." And it was this apocalypse that initiated his deep and thorough delving into the history of the relationship between the Church and the Jews since its inception, following the emergence of the followers of Jesus.

The question Carroll now had to face squarely was disturbing, to say the least. It was the issue of the link between the ancient Christian hatred of Jews and its connection to the 20th century murderous hatred that produced the death camps. Because Carroll is a Catholic, he focused on his own Church, but his narrative did not exclude the role of the Reformation in general and of German Protestantism in particular. Like every narrative, the story unfolds with a beginning, a middle and an end. The end in this case is the cross at Auschwitz. Writes Carroll, "Once the end reveals itself, the beginning and the middle can be understood anew."

It came as a revelation to me that initially the cross was not a reflective symbol of early Christianity. Prior to the fourth century, symbols such as palm branches, fish, the bird of paradise, or the monogram of Jesus were favoured, but the cross is not to be found, for example, on the catacombs of Rome. The place of the cross in the Christian imagination came not with Paul but with the Roman Emperor Constantine at the beginning of the fourth century. For Constantine, the cross was transformed into a sword in a vision he supposedly had of a cross of light in the heavens accompanied by the message "Conquer by this." Carroll writes that "Constantine put the Roman execution device [the cross], now rendered with a spear, at the center not only of the story of his conversion to Christianity, but of the Christian story itself".

It is common knowledge that prior to Constantine's conversion and conquests in the name of Christianity, Judaism and Christianity were pretty much on a par in the Roman Empire. At the beginning of the fourth century, there were at least three million Jews throughout the Empire, comparable to the number of Christians. In fact, Jews enjoyed a higher level of tolerance from the imperial authorities than Christians did. Maybe that was because Christianity had within it the proselytizing drive, and Judaism did not, making Christianity more offensive to pagan cults and culture.



Constantine and his mother Helena, together, transformed that world. Under the auspices of Ambrose (339-397), the bishop of Milan, Helena was elevated as the source of the discovery and rescue of the actual cross – allegedly – upon which Jesus was crucified. Here emerged the concept of the True Cross. The negative image of the Jew was also bound up with the discovery of the True Cross, because the legend associated with this breakthrough involved a Jew who knew the secret of the long-buried treasure and would only reveal its location after extensive torture. Carroll holds that the purported finding of the True Cross was the definitive victory over the Jews, "the end of a two-hundred-year-old sibling rivalry," after which a relative equality between Christians and Jews would never exist again.

The significance of the True Cross was that it placed new accent on the role of the cross, both literally and theologically, which in turn emphasized the death of Jesus, not his life and resurrection. Since, as we know, Jews were incriminated in the crucifixion of Jesus, whether rightly or wrongly, the legend of the True Cross reinforced the unfolding hatred of Jews. It acted as a signal that the punishment of the Jews was long overdue and was now justified, particularly since the astonishing and miraculous "discovery" was attributed to the saintly Helena, popularized as a benefactress of churches, priests and nuns, and devoted mother of the emperor. (Never mind that her emperor son was the murderer of his own son as well as other contenders to his throne, and that she was part of a family filled with violence and immorality.) Thus with Helena as its foundation, the idea of the centrality of the cross spread quickly, and with it the focus on Jesus' crucifixion, suffering, death and burial.

We now have a beginning and an end to the story of the Church and the Jews. It begins with the True Cross and ends at Auschwitz. We know the middle as well. It is a horrific tale of repeated pogroms, expulsions, inquisitions, murderous mobs, and other forms of violence against Jews that persisted through the centuries and culminated in the murder of six million Jews in the Holocaust. Throughout, the Church was an instrument of ideological preaching that encouraged ferocity against the Jews, and the cross was its most effective propaganda tool.

It was as if the enduring hostility mounted against the Jews was an unremitting war of the cross. There is a clear indication of the place of the cross in murderous Christian passions from the earliest of pogroms – that is, the crusaders' onslaught against Jews in 1096 on their way to Jerusalem. Although the crusaders' main objective was to drive the Muslims from the Holy City, they got sidetracked en route, massacring and terrorizing thousands of Jewish men, women and children in the Rhineland.

Solomon bar Simson, in telling the story of the crusaders' rampage against Jews of the Rhineland, wrote about the symbolic importance of the cross to the Christian mobs as follows: "They decorated themselves prominently with their signs, placing a profane symbol – a horizontal line over a vertical one – on the vestments of every man and woman… their ranks swelled until the number of men, women and children exceeded a locust horde covering the earth."

Carroll writes that the Crusaders' ferocity was fuelled by a cross-inspired righteousness. That inspiration can be seen again and again in the abhorrent historical record, whether it was the initiation of the blood libel in England in 1144 that lives on today among anti-Semites, or the expulsion of Jews from France in the 14th century, or the Spanish Inquisition of 1492. And it remains the inspiration for the papal cross at Auschwitz, which ultimately must be seen as an express desire to Christianize the Holocaust.

It turns out that my childhood inclination to find the cross offensive was unwittingly deserved. I wish I could now say otherwise. And as the current fashion of wearing crosses as ornaments has proliferated, I'm now confronted by this icon's presence in unexpected times and places. I am not surprised when a church authority is so adorned, but when Oprah Winfrey sports a diamond-encrusted cross on one of her trendy shows, I do find it remarkable.

I don't doubt that today's wearers of the cross are merely making a positive statement about their commitment to Christianity. Nor do I have reason to believe that such adornment has any intended malice. Nevertheless, it would be well for all, Jew and Christian alike, to appreciate that the cross is an expression of the accentuation of the death of Jesus rather than his life, and that this has had – and continues to have – grave consequences for Jews, not the least of which is the current intensification of anti-Semitism that is still buttressed by the accusation of the role of the Jew in Jesus' crucifixion.

Reflections on the Jewish Games

The Games of the 17th Maccabiah began with an emotional opening ceremony at Ramat Gan Stadium, on the outskirts of Tel Aviv. In 1997, this was the site of the tragic footbridge collapse where four Australian athletes lost their lives and many others were seriously injured.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But inasmuch as the trauma of those 1997 Games represented one of the lowest points in the history of the Maccabi movement, the Maccabiah that just ended brought with it a sense of healing and closure. Leading the procession of more than 7,000 competitors were the families of three of the four Australians who died eight years ago.

The poignancy of that entrance, in punctuating an otherwise spirited evening of song and dance, seemed aptly to reflect the vicissitudes that have been not only part of the Maccabiah experience but that are also so integral to Israeli life in general.

On the one hand there is celebration, but never far away is the spectre of tragedy, whether past or present. And so, while our quintessential festival of sport grabbed the daily headlines, more deaths were counted after yet another suicide bombing in Netanya just a few days after the Games got underway.

To claim that the 2005 Maccabiah ran with flawless precision would be stretching reality into the realm of fantasy. There were the inevitable logistical headaches. Some of the accommodation centres were considered below par, transportation and communications were often problematic, and there were variable complaints about the location and quality of several of the sports venues. There could also have been more interaction between Israelis and their guests from the Diaspora, and there should have been more opportunities for athletes to tour the country and absorb the sights and sounds that define the land and its people.

But all in all, and despite the glitches, most of our team would likely agree that they had a great time in Israel. However, what they now do with their experience is what really counts. If their visit translates into a heightened awareness of their Jewish identity and a closer and more passionate connection to Eretz Israel, then the Maccabi flame will indeed have cast an alluring light. If not, the broader concept of what the Maccabiah ought to be about needs to be re-examined.

The closing ceremonies were staged at Sultan's Pool just outside the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem. The Games came to a formal end with a moving rendition of Hatikvah and an impressive fireworks display. A magnificent full moon embraced the City of David, beckoning us to return, and soon.

A much-yellowed reproduction of a New York Times tribute to a certain Daniel Friedlander, dated October 15, 1936, hangs in the dining room of Beit Daniel in Zichron Ya'acov. It brims with unbridled praise for the natural gifts of the young Jewish pianist from Palestine whose untimely death, at age 18, robbed the world of a budding musical genius. Two charming oil portraits of the long-forgotten young artist grace the walls nearby it. With a cherubic smile, Daniel gazes out at us through the thick haze of seven decades.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

The Jerusalem Music Center is a noble enterprise. Among its many activities, it organizes workshops and master classes that aim to foster young Israeli musical talent. Once a year, the youth division invites 30 to 40 of the more gifted musicians in the country, aged 14 to 18 – string players, for the most part – to the beautiful grounds of Beit Daniel, a quiet mountain retreat established in Friedlander's memory. This inspired and inspiring setting high atop Mount Carmel, in the middle of a pine wood, has served as an incubator for generations of developing performing artists.

Wandering about, the soughing of boughs in the tall trees intermingling with strains of music wafted upon mountain breezes came to me like a soothing balm. Every now and then, I cast an absent-minded look into the distance. The serene detachment of this artistic refuge stood in stark contrast to that other Israel, unremittingly intense and stressful, visible far below on the hot and muggy coastal lowland, beyond which the blue waters of the Mediterranean Sea stretched out to the horizon.

I am always deeply touched by the generosity and wisdom of people who, like Friedlander's memorializers, transform their personal bereavement into affirmations of life for the benefit of others. For it is all too easy when visited by tragedy to lapse into a permanent state of brooding despair and bitterness.

At one point, as I stood idly gazing upon Daniel's portrait, the rapturous sounds of a young ensemble in rehearsal behind me, I reflected upon the irrepressible vitality of a culture that knows how to alchemize its ill fortune and grief into joy and promise. How different we are from so many of our Palestinian adversaries who tend to translate their personal misfortune into cults of hate, vengefulness and destruction.

Herein, perhaps, lies the great secret of our success and survival as a people. It is manifest in the hundreds of initiatives like Beit Daniel scattered about this land much-visited by tragedy. And its ultimate expression, no doubt, is to be found in the birth of the State of Israel, rising phoenix-like out of the flames and ashes of the Holocaust.

At the final recital, I melted with pride. It touched me deeply knowing that my own son, Yoel, had turned his talents to the creation of something so beautiful, gentle and innocent. Growing up in central Jerusalem, he has known first-hand, and at very close range, his fair share of raw fear, violence and brutality. That he has been somewhat "damaged" by it, as we all have, goes without saying. And yet the proof that the forces of light had triumphed over those of darkness was now clearly evident before me.

I was infused throughout with an inner calm that I had not experienced so genuinely and profoundly in a very long time. And indeed, had the sinister, muffled droning of a helicopter, one of those ominous bearers of bad tidings, not intruded so rudely upon the fragile equilibrium, the day would have been perfectly heavenly from first to last.

But afterward, as we made our way down the road from the heights of Mount Carmel to the coastal plain below, we turned our radio back on. News of the latest suicide attack in Netanya quickly and abruptly dispelled the lingering mood of magic. The swarm of helicopters had thickened. At one point, I took a quick look back over my shoulder, up toward that mountain summit where the thin ether of music can make you almost giddy with pleasure.

I noted the curious dark cloud that, despite it being summer, had drifted in from the sea, and how Beit Daniel had slipped out of view somewhere behind it.

Disengaging rabbinic and political authority

The battle over Israel's unilateral disengagement from Gaza and parts of the West Bank is not only about borders, terrorism and demography. It also reflects the ongoing struggle between rabbinic and political authority.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

On the one hand, the government and political leaders, starting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and backed by a Knesset majority, have decided on disengagement. And they have ordered the army and police to implement this decision. In contrast, the leadership of the opposition includes many prominent rabbis who have instructed their followers to disobey orders related to this process. While other rabbis disagree with such political involvement, their voices are muted, and the confrontation between political and rabbinical authorities is likely to grow.

For many religious Israelis, this conflict is extremely disturbing, and it highlights the unresolved conflict of Orthodoxy in modern Israeli society. The members of this group were taught to respect and listen to the rabbis, without making any distinction between religious rulings and political judgments. But as citizens in a democracy, they are also bound by its rules.

Until recently, rabbinic and political leaders have managed to find compromises on the most difficult issues. After a long debate over defining the Jewish content of the Israeli state, both sides agreed to live without a written constitution. Instead, rabbinical and secular leaders clash over specific issues as they arise.

For example, when the debate over conversion to Judaism reached an impasse, both sides agreed to remove the religious designation from government identify cards. In this way, political leaders could maintain one set of criteria for who is a Jew, and religious groups could set their own definitions.

Another major point of contention has been the Israeli army. After a long and difficult period of negotiation, the Israel Defence Forces agreed to allow religious soldiers – men and women – to serve in special units. The rabbis continue to maintain religious authority in this framework, while military issues are left in the hands of the officers. The army rabbinate helps mediate clashes with respect to Shabbat regulations and other issues involving observant soldiers.

Recently, the number of haredi recruits has increased dramatically, and their role in defending Israel against terrorism has been important. As well, according to published information, more than 40 per cent of Israeli army personnel are religious. So, at least up till now, the system has worked.

But on the critical issues of territories and settlements, there is no room for compromise.

The IDF, under the control of the democratically elected government, has ordered soldiers to proceed with disengagement from Gaza, including the removal of all Israeli citizens.

Yet, the opposing rabbis have told religious soldiers to refuse these "unacceptable orders" from the secular state. Claiming to speak for a higher authority, a number of rabbis have argued that the government is acting undemocratically and has no authority to force Jews to leave any part of the Land of Israel.

As a result, a few soldiers have refused to carry out their orders during the first stages of the disengagement process, including the closing off of Gaza's Jewish communities to prevent pro-settler reinforcements from entering. Many others are extremely confused and conflicted about being forced to choose between their loyalty to the state and the IDF on the one hand and the rabbis on the other.

It's too early to know how this conflict will end, and how many religious soldiers – including a major part of the officer corps – will feel estranged from the IDF, or how many will abandon the religious framework as a result of the tension and join the secular, and even anti-religious segments, of society.

But for many other religious Zionists, the intensity of this clash might lead them to reject the scope of rabbinical authority in the political sphere. This could also decrease the secular political leadership's ability to forcibly narrow the definition of the Jewish elements in Israeli public life.

Ironically, this clash could lead to a richer and less politicized expression of the Jewish renaissance in Israel.

ROSE FAMILY CLUB CELEBRATES ITS 60TH ANNIVERSARY: The Rose Family Club recently celebrated its 60th anniversary at the Wagman Centre at Baycrest Terrace with 135 in attendance. Highlights included a slide show by Steve Matz of Michigan recounting his climb up Mount Everest and the honouring of senior members Jean Rose, Ida Shafer, secretary, and Dave Rose, treasurer. The club was founded in 1945 by patriarch Beryl Rose "so cousins won't pass in the street and not know each other." Beryl and his wife, Mintzi, had 15 children, two of whom died in infancy, and 11 of whom moved from the Ukraine to Toronto in the 1920s. The family club holds monthly meetings, annual summer picnics and Chanukah parties, and an anniversary party every five years, bringing cousins together from across Canada, the United States, Israel and England.

Why do Jewish schools make McGuinty sad?

By SHELDON BASCH

School Parents SPEAK

I recently signed up for Canadian Jewish Congress's excellent daily e-mail service, which provides excerpts of statements made in the Ontario legislature that are of interest to the Jewish community. What I have seen so far has been quite disappointing.

On what seems like a daily basis, Premier Dalton McGuinty and his ministers disparage "private" education and anyone who favours supporting educational choices outside the public school system.

For example, on May 5, in answer to a question from an opposition MPP about school closings, the premier stated: "Here are some basic facts: the NDP, on their watch, closed 155 public schools. The Conservatives, on their watch, closed 503 public schools. At the same time, sadly, 266 private schools opened… I'll put our record against those records any day."

Get that? According to McGuinty, it's a sad thing when a private school opens.

In the abstract, that might be a legitimate opinion. However, as the premier well knows, under the current discriminatory education funding system in Ontario, Jewish schools are only permitted to operate as private schools. As a result, the government's policy of opposition to private education includes, as an integral element, opposition to Jewish and other non-Catholic faith-based schools.

The premier's words in the legislature offer no glimmer of recognition that non-Catholic faith-based schools should be recognized as equally valuable and as worthy of government support as publicly funded Catholic and public schools. Just the opposite, in fact. Jewish schools are private schools, and private schools make the premier sad.

This is especially disturbing given the well established importance of Jewish day school education in ensuring Jewish continuity. In the ultimately unsuccessful Adler case (which went to the Supreme Court of Canada) on school funding, the court found, based on expert evidence, that "the Jewish community's survival as an identifiable and practising religious community depends upon broad access for Jewish children to Jewish day schools."

In opposing non-discriminatory education funding, the premier and his ministers are unintentionally undermining the very real ongoing struggle of the Jewish community and other minority religious communities for cultural survival.

To throw salt in our wound, at the same time as the premier attacks non-discriminatory education funding, he speaks publicly as if his government was a champion of minority rights. For example, on May 10, in answer to an NDP question about the government's support for measures to eliminate racial discrimination against nurses who are members of racial minorities, McGuinty stated: "I know that I speak for every single member of this legislature when I say that we stand against discrimination of any kind, whether it's against our nurses or any other Ontarian."

The undisputed reality is quite different. McGuinty's government has consistently refused to comply with the UN Human Rights Committee's 1999 ruling that Ontario's Catholic-only denominational school funding is discriminatory and in violation of international law. In fact, his government took steps to fully reinstate the discrimination by retroactively removing the former government's "Equity in Education Tax Credit" that had begun to level the playing field for non-Catholic religious minorities.

Perhaps the premier feels that it's enough if he stands up against anti-Semitism, as he has done with admirable alacrity. But the reality is that his government's ongoing policy of deliberately overlooking official religious discrimination, in open violation of international law, means that no member of a minority community can feel secure.

Furthermore, if the price of the premier's active opposition to anti-Semitism is that the Jewish community is expected to silently accept ongoing discrimination in the public service that most affects our ability to ensure Jewish continuity, then the forces of anti-Semitism will have won a partial victory.

The premier and his government should rethink their continuing failure to provide fair and non-discriminatory support for the minority of faith based schools in Ontario that are not already fully funded by the government.

To help end this discrimination, contact the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools at oajds@canada.com.

Book chronicles Israelis' love of country

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Benay Katz, a Milwaukee, Wis. native who made aliyah 30 years ago, wants people to know how Israelis really feel about living in Israel.

Together with friend Liza Wiemer who still lives in Milwaukee, she wrote Waiting for Peace, How Israelis Live with Terrorism, a collection of interviews with Israelis from all walks of life.

The book came about, said Katz, who was here on a recent promotional tour, after Wiemer become frustrated with the inaccuracies of the news media on the coverage of Israel.

"She would call me after every attack and ask about the [mood in the country]," said Katz.

Wiemer travelled to Israel, and together she and Katz went across the country interviewing some 75 Israelis about their particular situation.

"I set up the interviews before she arrived, and I tried to pick as wide a range of people as possible. Not all the 44 people who are in the book are terrorist victims, but everyone has been affected by terrorism. Israel is a small country; everyone knows someone."

Among those interviewed were a girl who was injured in a terrorist attack, residents of a northern Shomron settlement, a driver of an armoured bus, a reserve soldier, a university student and the head of an aid centre for troubled neighbourhoods.

The common thread, Katz said, was that everyone was optimistic, and "they all expressed their love of Israel. No one voiced hate for the Arabs, Their only wish was for peace.

"It was like one voice coming out of the country. They all said, 'Let's get over this and coexist.'"

Katz, who lives with her five children and husband Jeff in a small community on a hill overlooking the Jezriel Valley, said Israeli high school students take part in coexistence seminars, and "are always taught to strive for peace.

"A few years back, 79 per cent of Palestinian children said they wanted to be suicide bombers."

Those interviewed did express fear, she said, but the older they were, the less fear they felt.

"I have a chapter about an elderly couple who was in the Palmach. The intifadah is just another chapter for them. They do not see it as anything different. It is a continuation of past terrorism."

Katz said each of her five children carries a cellphone, and they keep constant track of each other. "Each parent is command central, although in the past few months, the cellphone bills have gone down a little."

Jeff Katz, a tour guide, said tourists are slowly coming back, but some people in the book said they were "disappointed with North American Jews for not supporting us. They felt deserted. Evangelical Christians were coming, but Jewish tourism was down by 90 per cent."

All profits from the book are being donated to charity, said Katz. "This is our mission. [Liza] started by asking me, 'What can we do to help Israel?' This is what we did."

"אם יהודי אוכל תרנגולת- סימן שאחד מהם חולה"....

Hitler items fetch $32,400 at Montreal auction

BRAM EISENTHAL
JTA

MONTREAL — Which was the ultimate irony, some wondered – the fact an auction that included six items illustrated or signed by Adolf Hitler was held in a church, or that it took place in a city with one of the world's largest communities of Holocaust survivors?

Despite a glut of publicity, much of it negative, Montreal auction house Iegore-Hotel des Encans, which is housed in an old church, went ahead with its art auction on the evening of July 19, selling almost all of its 212 lots, including the six Hitler items, which sold for a total of $32,400 to a buyer who wished to remain anonymous.

The auction house came into possession of the items – two signed greeting cards on personalized Adolf Hitler Third Reich stationary, and four architectural drawings done by the amateur artist and future dictator — through a party who also wished to remain anonymous.

When the auction became public several weeks ago, auctioneer Iegor de Saint Hippolyte, 57, a Russian immigrant who came to Canada in 1983, was thrown on the defensive.

"I understand why some people might be upset," he told The CJN. "My own grandfather was in a concentration camp. But I'm doing it for the same reason I would sell a poster of Lenin or Trotsky…. it is part of history and also my job."

"We find it deplorable that these objects, originally belonging to one of the most reviled mass murderers in history, would financially benefit either the seller or the purchaser," said Ann Ungar, executive director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and Museum.

"Without a doubt, these objects should be given to an institution devoted to education and research, for the benefit of the general public."

The three-hour auction included several Miros, a Picasso that was pulled because it was thought to be fake and a Warhol, among other items. But none of those mattered to those who came to see what happened to the Hitler works.

"Members of the media will have to leave the room," Saint Hippolyte announced in French five minutes before the Hitler lots came up. The winning bids, which all came from the same unidentified person, were placed by phone.

Hitler's pencil-on-paper drawing called "House Wachenfeld," or Mountain House, went for $7,000, as did "Monument," a charcoal drawing on paper.

The next two items — a greeting card signed in 1935 and another from 1938 — went for $2,100 and $2,300, respectively.

A pencil-on-paper drawing by Hitler associate Albert Speer of the Linz Opera House – which Hitler later "corrected" – went for $7,500, while a pencil-on-paper sketch called "German School" sold for $6,500.

There was one other Nazi-related item auctioned the same evening, a black-and-white photo of the Christian Nazi Socialist Party of Canada, taken at an organizational assembly on June 20, 1938. It sold for $250.

Jews for Jesus plans fall blitz on Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Officials from the counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism vow they'll confront Jews for Jesus on the streets of Montreal this fall when the Christian missionary group targets the city's Jews for the first time.

"We will definitely be there," said Julius Ciss, director of Toronto-based Jews for Judaism.

Jews for Jesus will be in Montreal from Sept. 18 to Oct. 8 as part of its "Behold Your God" campaign, a five-year, $22 million (US) international recruitment drive. Started in 2001, it aims to convert as many Jews as possible to Christianity in 65 cities worldwide with Jewish populations of 25,000 or more.

Ciss said that even though Montreal has a reputation for being a very traditional Jewish community that is almost impervious to the influence of Christian messianic groups, that shouldn't be taken for granted.

"It's true there's never been a branch of Jews for Jesus in Montreal, but there have been several messianic synagogues. Where were the Jews who went there coming from?" he asked.

"Jews for Jesus is the largest such type of group in terms of both budget and world outreach."

Toronto was targeted in 2003 and thus far has been the only other Canadian city targeted by the campaign. Ciss said that worldwide, the drive has handed out 11.5 million pamphlets, leading to 12,500 recipients "expressing an interest" in Christianity and 851 people becoming "evangelical Jews."

Montreal's Jewish population "tends to be more religiously observant than other Jewish communities in North America," Jews for Jesus notes on its Canadian website.

"Also, many Holocaust survivors reside in Montreal. The reality is that most Jews have never heard the Gospel in terms they can understand and are perishing without Messiah! Montreal is indeed a city which needs the hope of the Gospel!"

The site adds that the global campaign "might just be the largest evangelistic effort since those first-century Jews for Jesus proclaimed the good news!"

Ciss said Jews for Judaism does not object to Christian missionaries spreading their message.

"What we oppose is the specific targeting of Jews as a minority," he said. "We also object to the deception they [Jews for Judaism] use, such as using Jewish symbols and terminology, or the notion that Jews [who believe Jesus is the Messiah] can also be 'fulfilled' or 'committed' Jews."

On its website, the missionary group says it plans to use "prayer partners," "campaigners" and "stewards" – behind-the-scenes people – to facilitate its work in Montreal.

Jews for Judaism will counter the campaign through "preventive education" and other activities.

"First, we will educate the Jewish community about the whole issue of why Jews don't accept Christian belief," Ciss said.

"We will also use our literature, advertise in media, have programming for adults, go to Jewish day schools and synagogues, and even figure out where [Jews for Jesus] will be distributing their literature so we can be there to hand out our own."

"They go to visible street corners with high pedestrian traffic at peak hours," he said.

"Don't expect to see them outside Cavendish Mall," he added, referring to a popular shopping destination in the Jewish neighbourhood of Cote St. Luc.

Sometimes, the group missionizes in unanticipated locations, Ciss said, "but 75 per cent of the time, we find them."

Plans also call for an all-day counter-missionary seminar at a Montreal synagogue.

Ciss, who himself was part of Jews for Jesus for five years, said Jews for Judaism even plans to rent space on a public billboard to advertise the screening of one of its documentaries, Survivor's Story.

It will also be recruiting local volunteers and is seeking the cooperation of other Jewish organizations.

In late June, he and Rabbi Michael Skobac, Jews for Judaism's education director, met with officials from Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, to map out a plan of action ahead of the fall campaign.

Ciss said Jews for Judaism is working "non-stop" in the lead-up to Sept. 18.

He hoped Jews for Jesus' first Montreal drive won't be very effective, but "even one [conversion] is too many," he said.

"When I was a member, I must have seen 200 or 300 Jews come through the door. I don't want to see a single Montreal Jew get involved. This is something we can pre-empt."

Jews for Judaism can be reached at 905-761-0040.

Hooked on Hillel: board president says endowments would add stability

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

With the growth of anti-Israel sentiment on university campuses in recent years, the importance of having a place where students can explore their Jewishness in a pluralistic environment cannot be overstated, says Agi Mandel.

Now entering her second year as president of the board of Hillel of Greater Toronto, Mandel became involved in the organization in the late 1990s. In March, she was one of three Hillel lay leaders to receive the international organization's Exemplar of Excellence award.

In addition to taking on fundraising-related leadership roles for the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life – Canada's first purpose-built Hillel building – and developing the board by recruiting new members and increasing its involvement, Mandel has been an accessible, visible president, said Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

She often attends Hillel events, such as the January concert by Israeli singer Idan Raichel and an Israeli fashion show that took place in March.

"I love it," Mandel said in an interview at her Toronto home. "Once you've attended one of these things, you're hooked. There's an exhilaration to seeing the students having a great time and a meaningful experience that's special and that's Jewish."

Agi Mandel

Her board of more than 30 members includes six students, among them the elected presidents of Hillel at the University of Toronto, York University, Ryerson University and Seneca College.

Mandel, who also sits on the steering committee of National Jewish Campus Life, said she is impressed not just by the students' capabilities but by their emotional maturity in "dealing with issues that are challenging for everybody."

One aspect of Hillel involves "meeting the students on their own terms" and responding to their needs, she said. She stressed the importance of Hillel staff in providing continuity from year to year, but noted that "as much as possible, [planning] is student-driven."

An alumna of U of T, Mandel admits that Hillel was not on her radar screen when she attended the downtown campus in the mid-1970s.

Her current leadership role parallels her previous involvement at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – her "first love" – where she chaired the UJA Women's Campaign in 1998.

Although she hadn't sought involvement in either organization, in both cases she took an active role after being invited to participate.

"As in so many community situations, people just need to be asked," said the mother of two grown children – one of whom was an undergraduate at U of T when she first joined Hillel's board. "I found something I really enjoyed and valued. You get back so much more when you do get involved, and I think it's important in this case that the students feel the support of the community."

Mandel's goals include increasing Hillel's profile as "a critical program for keeping students connected to the larger Jewish community and each other at a pivotal time" in their lives, and increasing the organization's resources through fundraising.

"We'd love to establish endowments for different program initiatives that would stabilize our ability to plan," she said.

The Wolfond Centre, the focus of Hillel's last major fundraising project, "shows us the difference that a beautiful facility makes," said Mandel. "It energizes the whole program and really inspires pride."

The centre, she said, has become a model that will be referred to as Hillel proceeds with plans for refurbishment of premises at York University and eventually a new location there, as well as with plans for a newly dedicated space at Ryerson University.

When Mandel first became involved with Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, as Hillel of Greater Toronto was then known, people didn't understand why a place like the Wolfond Centre was needed, she said.

"We've come a long way since then."

Comedy course gives confidence to the mentally ill

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Special to The CJN

For most of us, laughter is a momentary feeling of happiness that may stay with us throughout our day – a comedian or a funny sitcom makes you laugh and you enjoy the moment. Yet it's a transient thing.

But for David Granirer, laughter isn't just about feeling good. It's about helping people who are battling long-term mental illness.

Granirer has degrees in counselling and organizational behaviour. He's also a teacher, an experienced crisis centre counsellor and a stand-up comedian.

He uses this background to transform comedy into therapy, and he's helped many people – including himself – take control of their lives.

In 2004 he started a program called "Stand Up For Mental Health," a year-long course designed to instill confidence in people with mental illness by teaching them how to do stand-up comedy.

It's a labour of love for the 44-year-old Vancouverite, who has battled depression most of his adult life and sees a psychiatrist once a month.

"My depression probably hit in my late teens," he says. "But I wasn't diagnosed until my early 30s. [My psychiatrist] ended up telling me that she thought I was depressed. Like a lot of people, I really resisted that notion for about three years before I went on medication. I just thought it was normal to go around feeling depressed."

This is one of the myths the program is trying to challenge.

"It's really powerful in terms of fighting public stigma around mental illness. We're presenting people with mental illness as strong, capable, funny, resilient… and that's not the image that most people have of them," Granirer says.

His heritage played a part in why he started the program.

"I come from a family of Holocaust survivors. That's given me a real perspective on the world. It's influenced my outlook," he says. "I relate to people with mental illness because they also are outsiders in our society. Being Jewish, I've always rooted for the underdog. Jewish people are kind of the quintessential underdogs."

He cites the success of the program as proof there's a need for a new approach to helping people with mental illnesses.

Granirer believes his course provides a creative alternative for mental health providers to use in their attempts to engage the mentally ill.

Three months into the course, Granirer takes most of his students to perform live onstage.

"Part of the strength of this program is that the people in it tell the people in the audience exactly who they are, and the audience responds by cheering and laughing with them. And that is a huge boost to their confidence and self-esteem. It's like a super-charged support group," he says.

"When you go to [Alcoholics Anonymous], you tell your story and there's respectful silence. Well, in this group, people listen and then they laugh and applaud and tell you how great you are."

Great scientist, great Jew

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

What makes for a great Jew? How do we know that we have encountered such an individual?

Dr. Mordecai Haffkine was offered the post of assistant professor of bacteriology at the Imperial University of Odessa in 1888. There was one condition attached: he would have to agree to be baptized a Christian. His response was this: "I was a Jew before I became a bacteriologist. I feel there is greater honour in remaining a Jew."

Shortly thereafter, when Haffkine left for Italy, there were two items he carried himself and did not give to a porter. One was a wooden box containing his microscope. The other was a black velvet bag with his tallit and tfillin.

The next year, 1889, Haffkine was invited to Paris to continue his research at the world-renowned Pasteur Institute. The day after his arrival, he was nailing something to the doorpost of his laboratory when Dr. Louis Pasteur stopped by to welcome him and asked him why he had begun renovating his laboratory so soon. Haffkine answered that it was a mezuzah, a quotation from the Torah that is nailed to the doorpost of a Jew's living quarters or workplace.

Dr. Haffkine answered, "Particularly in a place where we search for truth and need God's guidance in the quest."

Pasteur went on to inquire what germs and bacteria Haffkine would like to study in order to find a cure. Without hesitation, Haffkine responded that would like to work on cholera. Pasteur asked him why, and Haffkine told him that people looked for a scapegoat after millions died during the Black Plague that swept Europe more than half a millennium earlier. The Jews were chosen and many were slaughtered.

"If I could find a serum for cholera, it would be a fitting memorial for those martyred," Haffkine explained.

After producing a serum that cured mice, Haffkine had to determine whether the serum was toxic to humans. Haffkine injected himself with cholera bacteria and then with serum. Forty eight hours later, Haffkine reported to Pasteur that a serum against cholera had been developed and that it was free of toxic reactions on humans.

Within several weeks, word came to Pasteur of a severe cholera outbreak in Odessa. Haffkine offered to return there with his serum. But the Russians had a problem with accepting the offer.

"The government of His Imperial Majesty prefers peasants to die with a prayer for the czar on their lips than to owe their lives to a Jew," he was told.

But Haffkine's opportunity to help came in 1893. Cholera had broken out in India and the British government requested that he bring his serum to India. He would remain there for 14 years.

"Life is holy unto the Lord." These are the words he would murmur to himself each time he went out to vaccinate a village. Accompanying him everywhere were his trusted microscope and his tallit and tfillin. He prayed every morning, seeking God's guidance as he went off to deliver his serum.

A great Jew, like Mordecai Haffkine, understands that life is holy. He also understands that the way to holiness is through a serious encounter with Jewish life, God, Torah, and the people of Israel.

Disengagement on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In a few days, the Jewish presence in the Gaza Strip will be no more. As Israel prepares to leave Gaza and four settlements in the West Bank, Israeli websites are in overdrive providing context, coverage and a forum for passionate voices. Here are some sites to watch. (Thanks to Rabbi Gedalia Zweig for this topic.)

In its "Engaging Disengagement" section, the Department for Jewish Zionist Education presents a summary of the disengagement plan, arguments for and against, and a very good list of where major Israeli groups and political parties stand. There's also a helpful explanation of how we ended up with the word "disengagement." In Hebrew, the word being used is "hitnatkut" or "hinatkut," which could be translated as "an act of self-separation." Finding an English equivalent has been tricky. "Withdrawal" has overtones of retreat under pressure. "Disengagement" was chosen because it lends itself to "the notion of a reduction in friction, without any overtly negative connotations." [http://tinyurl.com/7lthz]

If you want to spend time reading official position papers and pronouncements about disengagement, the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs website is the place for you. There are more than 36 documents and public addresses there. [http://tinyurl.com/43l87] The central one, dated June 6, 2004, is the Israeli cabinet's resolution to approve the plan. It outlines how the process will work and talks about life after disengagement, "if and when there is evidence from the Palestinian side of its willingness, capability and implementation in practice of the fight against terrorism, full cessation of terrorism and violence and the institution of reform as required by the ["road map" peace plan], it will be possible to return to the track of negotiation and dialogue." [http://tinyurl.com/5gh55]

Israel's media are going all-out to provide in-depth coverage of the disengagement, many with special English language sections devoted to late-breaking events. Like most Israeli news sites, the Jerusalem Post's Disengagement 2005 provides news, maps and analysis. One novel feature is a gallery of pro and anti bumper stickers. But it's the pointed commentary that makes the site compelling. Evelyn Gordon writes, "These protesters have no interest in public opinion, because they do not believe that democracy works." In "Rattling the Cape: the dark side of Chabad," Larry Derfner argues: "In Israel, the most significant, influential thing the movement does is spread political poison." [http://tinyurl.com/auoxc] Also check out Ha'aretz [http://tinyurl.com/cmpt4] and Ynetnews, Yediot Achronot's English site. [http://tinyurl.com/bogzn]

Sites such as israelinsider, "Israel's Daily Newsmagazine," [http://web.israelinsider.com/] and Israel National News – also known as Arutz Sheva – [www.israelnationalnews.com/] make no secret of their opposition to the withdrawal. The Hebrew version of Arutz Sheva has an interesting interactive map with short videos about the settlements to be evacuated. [www.inn.co.il/map/]

Rabbi Shlomo Aviner has no sympathy for soldiers charged with evacuating settlements. His "The Expellers' Ten Commandments" includes such "commandments" as "I am not your God! Everyone has beliefs which accompany them throughout their lives. But when you expel, remember: You have no God! Otherwise you may, God forbid, remember your humanity when you see women and children crying at being expelled from their homes… Thou shalt steal! This you can carry out excellently by taking away a man's house and property, especially if he gets only minimal compensation – and then giving it all to murderers." [http://web.israelinsider.com/ Views/6017.htm]

Most criticism is coming from pullout opponents. But former MK Uri Avnery, founder of the Gush Shalom (the self-described "hard core of the Israeli peace movement") is not impressed either. [http://gush-shalom.org/english/] He writes that "in spite of all the loud talk about 'disengagement,' [Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon's heart is with the settlers. He intends to annex to Israel most of the West Bank settlements – if not all of them." [http://tinyurl.com/chfyf]

Current deputy mayor of Tel Aviv Yael Dayan, another former MK, sounds a more optimistic note. "It is not the final nor decisive step that will bring about peace – far from it – but without it we would be standing where we have been for 37 years, in occupation, depriving the Palestinians of their rights, propagating a lack of confidence, suffering from terror, and without dialogue with Palestinians." [http://tinyurl.com/dtvsn]

Next time, disengagement and the blogs.

Thoughts on diverse subjects

Books
Bernard Baskin

A number of my friends are collectors. They lust after art books, coins, pottery, old cars and period furniture. My craving, over the years, has been for written quotations.

These reflections, aphorisms, epigrams, observations and flashes of insight –call them what you will – are terse and prime examples of literary artistry. They usually involve a generalization or an observation about a recurring aspect of life that is unsettling or paradoxical.

The examples that follow include some original examples of my own.

• If speakers were compelled to talk before dinner, rather then after, we could all attend a banquet with a lighter heart, for nothing induces brevity more than an empty stomach.

• There's something wrong with the supply and demand of spirituality. There's lots of it in houses of worship when you don't much need it, and not enough when you are almost dying of disappointment and waiting lonely at a bus stop.

• When a person appears before the throne of judgment, the first question he could be asked is not, "Have you believed in God," or, "Have you prayed and observed the ritual," but, "Have you dealt honourably with your fellow man." –The Talmud

• In her last illness, my mother took my hand in hers tightly: for the first time I knew how callused a hand it was, and how soft was mine. –Charles Reznikoff

• The person who approaches me at a gathering and says rather belligerently, "I bet you don't remember me" is generally the kind of person I don't want to remember. He is brother to the nitwit who grins at me ominously with the challenge, "What's my name?"

• A question for the United Nations: how can two countries understand or empathize with each other when in one most of the adults are starving and in the other most are dieting?

• How many travellers would bother to take trips if they were bound to a vow of silence about the venture upon their return?

• One of the rarely considered advantages of growing old is the freedom to tell the truth about anything to anybody; and it is distressing that so few old persons take advantage of this liberty. That is because older people develop tact, which means to criticize privately, to avoid a dictatorial voice and to know when to avoid arguments.

• We take it as a compliment when told that we haven't changed a bit in 20 years. Is it really a compliment? I want my face and bearing to show some signs of the struggle for self-mastery over the years. A smooth porcelain face is a delight at 20, a rebuke at 40, and a mask of defeat at 80. –Sydney J. Harris

• The historian Will Durant reminded us that in the last 3,400 years of recorded history only 268 have been without war. The approaching war always seems necessary and "inevitable." It is only 20 years later that it is viewed as avoidable and futile. Is the mind condemned to live two steps behind the passion?

• There seems to be so much more evil than good in the world because evil is a short-term infection, while goodness is a long-term influence; thus it is always easier to see the dramatic effects of evil than the lengthening consequences of goodness.

• The most explosive combination in the world consists of sincerity added to ignorance; or prejudice wedded to power.

• What is the rainbow? It is God's bow turned upside down so that the arrows shoot away from the earth and bring no more destruction.

• Don't feel inferior if you're confused by current events. It's a mark of intelligence; only the extremely simple-minded aren't confused by the complexity of modern problems.

• In the history of ideas, the three most influential and widely known names of the last hundred years are probably Marx, Einstein and Freud; yet not one person in a thousand can accurately and lucidly describe what any of them said.

• We have conquered most of the contagious diseases of the body, but we have scarcely begun to combat the contagious diseases of the mind – prejudice, bigotry and hate – which have shattered more societies than all the viruses ever known to civilization.

• Everyone is a prisoner of his own pernicious experiences. They cannot be eliminated. But it is essential to recognize and acknowledge them in order to overcome them. –Sydney J. Harris

Some choice reads for summer

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

It's time for my annual summer reading survey. The choices are meant to be eclectic, if not necessarily popular.

For those who desire a closely reasoned discussion of a pressing halachic issue, Prof. Aviad Hacohen's The Tears of the Oppressed, which examines the Agunah problem, is worth a second look. Hacohen, who teaches in the faculty of law at Hebrew University, has marshalled an impressive array of sources to probe any possible avenues of freedom for the chained woman. Well over 100 pages of directly photocopied responsa highlight the last half of the book.

At the other end of the spectrum, both in tone and vision, is a remarkable book by Alan Lew, arrestingly titled This is Real and You are Completely Unprepared. Meant as a spiritual primer for the High Holy Days, Lew's ability to link the prayers of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur to the existential situation of every Jew is gripping. Many people consistently bemoan the lack of uplift they feel at this central time of the Jewish calendar, so Lew's narrative fills a gaping need.

David Weiss Halivni's moving account of his childhood as a talmudic prodigy, and the irrevocable loss of that world in the wake of the Shoah, is recorded in his 1996 memoir The Book and the Sword. Less a graphic depiction of Holocaust horrors and more a loving tribute to his lifelong passion for Talmud, Halivni's book captures how for Jews, faith is inextricably linked to texts and the universe of learning.

Sometimes one crosses paths with a book that comes as an unforeseen surprise. Such a work is Rabbi Yom Tov Schwarz's Eyes to See: Recovering Ethical Torah Principles Lost in The Holocaust. The book paints a picture of the proper ethical posture that should be taken by all Jews, but especially those in a position of authority, and the tragic decline of respect for rabbinic courts, which is partly self-created. The book is a unique combination of honesty and sensitivity, and in the current religious climate of hostility between denominations, it's an all-too-rare call for a return to civility in how Jews speak to and about one another.

Matan, the well-known Israeli institute for women's Torah learning, has put out a comprehensive book that will be of interest to all girls approaching their bat mitzvahs – as well as, of course, to their parents. Titled Traditions and Celebrations for the Bat Mitzvah, it contains a variety of articles, both scholarly and practical, including an analysis of the origins of the bat mitzvah, halachic issues surrounding the bat mitzvah, and suggestions for how to enhance the celebration of this coming of age.

Finally, appropriate to this age of terror and terrorism, the 1991 work Confronting Omnicide offers Jewish reflections on weapons of mass destruction. It contains several thoughtful pieces on Jewish perspectives regarding war and peace and investigates many of the buzzwords of the 9/11 world, such as acceptable losses, "collateral damage," pre-emptive strikes, and balance of terror.

Alas, the book is unfortunately timely. One yearns for a time when such a work will be relegated to the fantasy section of the bookshelf. May that day come soon.

Three weeks before Tisha b'Av

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

One of the challenges of the three weeks, and especially the nine days before Tisha b'Av, when many people don't eat meat, is trying to find ways to do dairy that don't require falling back on the old stand-bys of macaroni and cheese and lasagna. While quick and simple recipes are always preferred when temperatures soar, the desire for delicious food never abates.

Since parties and celebrations are curtailed, most gatherings of family and friends during this period focus on the dinner table. I always like my dairy meals to incorporate unique and simple appetizer and fun and interesting side dishes. More often than not, I turn to my favourite cheese, Brie. Kosher Brie is readily available and very affordable.

Brie, created in the seventh century in France, has a delicate and smooth taste and texture. The body of Brie is covered with a white rind. It can be savoured at room temperature and is equally delicious served with red or white wine. This soft, ripened cheese is made from cow's milk and is not for those who are counting calories.

BAKED BRIE IN PUFF PASTRY WITH HONEY WALNUT SAUCE

A reader from London, Ont., sent me this recipe that she got from Bon Appetite and I have to agree with her that it's smashing!

1 8-oz. wheel Brie
1 egg, beaten (for glaze)
1/4 cup butter
3 tbsp. honey
1 1/2 tsp. minced garlic
2 tbsp. chopped walnuts
1 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

Roll out puff pastry sheet on lightly floured surface. Place Brie in centre and fold pastry around it, sealing seams. Transfer to baking sheet, seam side up. Brush pastry with egg glaze. Cover and refrigerate. (Can be prepared 6 hours ahead.)

Preheat oven to 400. Bake Brie until pastry is golden, 18-25 minutes. Combine butter, honey and garlic in small saucepan over low heat. Stir until butter melts. Sprinkle sauce with walnuts and parsley. Place pastry-wrapped Brie on top of sauce on plates and serve with assorted crackers. Serves 8 to 10.

BRIE SOUFFLE

Great for brunch served with a sweet sparkling wine and fresh fruit.

8 tbsp. sweet butter, at room temperature
1/2 cups milk
1 tsp. salt
dash of Tabasco
3 eggs
1 lb. Brie, rind removed

Butter a 1 1/2-quart souffle dish. Butter one side of bread slices and cut each slice into thirds. In a bowl, whisk together the milk, salt, Tabasco and eggs. Coarsely grate the Brie. Arrange half of the bread, buttered side up, on the bottom of the dish. Sprinkle evenly with half of the Brie and then repeat, using remaining bread and Brie. Carefully pour the egg mixture over the bread. Let stand at room temperature for 30 minutes. Preheat oven to 350. Bake for 25 to 30 minutes, or until bubbling and golden. Serves 4 to 6.

BRIE STUFFED POTATOES

4 baked potatoes
3 oz. Brie, de-rinded
1/2 tsp. salt
1 egg yolk
2 oz. butter, softened
chives (chopped)

Preheat oven to 375. Slice off the top of each potato and scoop out the potato (place it in a bowl), leaving behind a potato skin shell ready for filling. In a bowl containing the scooped out potato, combine the Brie, salt, egg yolk and butter. Beat until combined and spoon the mixture into the potato skins. Place the filled potatoes on a baking sheet and bake for 10 minutes until the top of the filling is golden brown. Sprinkle the top of the potato with chopped chives and serve. Serves 4. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

BAKED BRIE WITH DRIED FRUIT

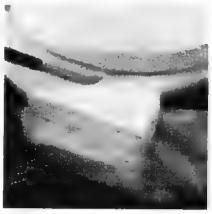
approx. 2 lb. Brie, round or wedge
1/4 cup sparkling sweet wine
1/4 cup dried apricots or peaches
1/8 cup toasted walnuts or almonds, coarsely chopped
1 sheet puff pastry, thawed
1 egg yolk
1 tbsp. water

Place Brie in the freezer for about 30 minutes to make it easier to handle. In a saucepan, bring wine and fruit to a boil and remove from heat. Cool. Cut Brie in half lengthwise, so you have a top half and a bottom half. Roughly chop fruit into 1/4-in. pieces and mix with toasted walnuts. Place mixture on bottom half of Brie, spread evenly and cover with top half.

On a floured surface, roll out thawed puff pastry to about half the original thickness or until it will cover both the top and bottom of the Brie. Whip egg yolk and water. Place filled Brie in the centre of the rolled out dough and wrap it completely, sealing overlapping dough with egg wash.



At this point, the Brie may be stored in the freezer for future use. Thaw overnight in the refrigerator before baking. For immediate use, chill for half an hour in the refrigerator.

Preheat oven to 400. Brush with egg wash. Bake on a greased baking sheet for 20-30 minutes or until golden brown. Cool for a few minutes and serve with freshly sliced baguette or toasted croutons.

BAKED BRIE WITH CARAMELIZED ONIONS

1 head garlic
1/4 cup butter
olive oil
1 yellow onion, sliced
1 Granny Smith apple - peeled, cored and sliced
1 (8-oz.) wedge Brie cheese
1 sheet frozen puff pastry, thawed
1 tbsp. melted butter

Preheat oven to 400. Place garlic on a baking sheet, and drizzle with olive oil. Roast for 15 to 20 minutes, or until soft. Set aside.

Meanwhile, melt 1/4 cup butter in a skillet over medium heat. Cook and stir onion and apple in butter until tender and browned. Set aside. Arrange Brie on top of thawed puff pastry. Top the cheese with the apple and onion mixture. Fold puff pastry over the cheese and pinch closed. Brush with melted butter. Bake about 20 to 25 minutes, or until golden brown. Serve warm. Garnish with whole cloves of roasted garlic. Serve with crackers or chunks of bread. Serves 4 as an appetizer.

British Jews disturbed by terror threat, Muslim reaction

By DANIELLA PELED
JTA

LONDON — Amid tightened security following the latest wave of attempted suicide bombings in London, British Jews are troubled both by the threat of terror and the ambivalent reaction of the United Kingdom's Muslim leadership.

The capital was still burying its dead from four co-ordinated suicide attacks July 7 that killed more than 50 people – including Jewish victims Miriam Hyman, 31; Susan Levy, 53; and Anat Rosenberg, 37 – when it was hit on July 21 by further attempts to bring murder and mayhem to London.

This time, the bombs failed to detonate fully, and there was only one reported injury. With suspects still at large, however, fear and suspicion swept a city still reeling from the July 7 atrocities.

The Community Security Trust, the body that monitors threats to the U.K. Jewish community, is ensuring that staff and volunteers maintain a high level of visibility around synagogues, schools and other community buildings.

Having stepped up its state of alert after the July 7 attacks, the trust urged Anglo Jewry to remain "extremely vigilant" after the latest incidents, fearing both terrorism and a spike in anti-Semitism.

The alarm had yet to reach its highest level last week, trust spokesperson Mike Whine said, because of the lack of any specific intelligence of a direct threat to the Jewish community.

But the government is taking the possibility very seriously. Community leaders report almost daily meetings among religious figures, the Home Office, the government body responsible for domestic security policy, and the police, with briefings on the security situation issued several times a day.

Anglo Jewry to remain 'extremely vigilant'

It's too early to tell whether the bombings have already caused an upsurge of attacks against Jews, Whine said.

"We were anyway suffering high levels of anti-Semitism, so it's difficult to say whether it has increased as a consequence," he said. "We've certainly seen some very inflammatory language on extremist websites blaming the bombing on Jews or on Israel."

The British Jewish community has been disturbed not only by the latest round of bombings but also by the response of the U.K.'s Muslim leadership to the growing threat of fanaticism in its midst.

The extent of the radicalization was highlighted by the news that nearly a quarter of U.K. Muslims have some sympathy with the feelings and motives of those who carried out the July 7 bombings, according to a poll sponsored by the Daily Telegraph newspaper.

The survey also revealed that 18 per cent of British Muslims feel little loyalty towards Britain, and 32 per cent believe that "western society is decadent and immoral and that Muslims should seek to bring it to an end."

Jewish leaders are concerned that U.K. Muslim leaders are failing to face up to this phenomenon and are instead sending out a dangerous message by consistently drawing a distinction between suicide bombings in Britain, which they condemn, and terror attacks in Israel, which they excuse.

"They see no inconsistency in that, and it's troubling," Whine said.

The Muslim Council of Britain, an umbrella group, emphatically condemned the London bombings, but it has always been circumspect when it comes to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"It is very important to remember the context," council spokesperson Inayat Bunglawala said. "Three thousand British Muslims haven't been killed by occupying troops. We are not routinely invaded. Our leadership is not being assassinated. What the Palestinian people are going through leads them to desperation."

Another prominent Muslim figure, Azzam Tamimi of the Muslim Association of Britain, also argued that Palestinian suicide bombings are different from terror attacks in Europe.

"The bombings were wrong in London, were wrong in Madrid, but it is a completely different situation in Palestine," said Tamimi, speaking on the BBC. "Thousands of ordinary Palestinians are rotting in refugee camps and reacting to oppression."

Rabbi Barry Marcus of London's Central Synagogue, who witnessed the July 7 double-decker bus bombing that killed 14 people, describes a sense of "anger and dismay" among his congregation at such statements.

"You can't condemn suicide bombing in London and condone it in Israel," he said. "They are trying to divert people from the real issues. Trying to find excuses for murder is abhorrent. The pity is that the Muslim community now has an opportunity to say, 'We have a problem and we need to deal with it.'"

Sharon mends fences in France as anti-Semitic acts drop

By LAUREN ELKIN
JTA

PARIS — A year ago, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon caused a diplomatic flap when he urged French Jews to flee anti-Semitism at home and move to the Jewish state.

This year, just ahead of a fence-mending visit to Paris – called to repair rifts caused not just by Sharon's comments but by France's pronounced pro-Palestinian tilt – the French interior ministry reported that anti-Semitic attacks had fallen 48 per cent in the first half of 2005 compared to the same period in 2004.

In 2004, 561 verbal or minor physical attacks were reported, versus 290 for this year. Violent acts, such as bombings or arson, are down from 148 to 49. Anti-Semitic graffiti are down as well – from 413 incidents the previous year to 241 this year.

The statistics were confirmed by CRIF, the umbrella organization of secular French Jewish groups.

"These results are the fruit of an effort begun in 2002, both through a productive dialogue with representatives of the Jewish community as well as a determined commitment by the domestic security services in the struggle against all forms of anti-Semitism," CRIF said.

The statistics came on the eve of a visit in which Sharon and French President Jacques Chirac each expressed their warm sentiments toward each other's country.

In a working lunch last Wednesday, Juy 27, that lasted 2½ hours, Chirac characterized Syria as a "threat to the stability of the region." The two leaders also discussed Lebanon and Iran.

Sharon rejected a French request to supply the Palestinian Authority security forces with arms and ammunition, noting that a PA police officer was involved in a terror attack the previous weekend that killed an elderly Israeli couple.

The future of Israeli democracy is at stake

By URI DROMI

Opinion

The withdrawal from Gaza, scheduled to begin in mid-August, is one of the most important events in the history of the State of Israel. It will determine whether Israel can continue to be a Jewish and democratic state.

In an Alert Paper published in June 2003 by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute, titled "Jewish Demography: Facts, Outlook, Challenges," a renowned demographer, professor Sergio DellaPergola, makes the following prediction: Sometime around 2014, there will be between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea more Arabs than Jews. My interpretation of this chilling statistic is that in less than 10 years, if Israel keeps the West Bank and Gaza and still wants to remain Jewish, then it will become an apartheid state; and if it wants to remain a democracy, then it will lose its Jewish nature. Or, in the words of a Palestinian poet-in-exile, Mahmud Darwish, "If you don't want a Palestinian state on 22 per cent of the land today, in 20 years there will be a Palestinian state on the whole land."

Pulling out of Gaza, then, is the beginning of a long journey which will hopefully bring Israel back to its senses. But is it indeed? Many Sharon mavens believe he wants to get rid of Gaza only to strengthen Israel's grip on the West Bank and thus coerce the Palestinians into accepting some kind of "autonomy." The trauma of the Gaza pullout, with the ugly scenes expected to flood TV screens, should supposedly convince the Israelis and the world community that further withdrawal is impossible. The prime minister even went to Ariel (a West Bank city of 18,000) recently and promised it would forever be ours.

If I were living in Ariel, I would start looking for a moving company, just in case. Not only because Sharon said something and maybe meant the opposite, but because the basic analysis of DellaPergola remains unchanged.

Whether Sharon meant it or not, he has just started a process bigger than he had envisioned – namely, bringing Israel to its viable borders. It remains to be seen if in due course he will be the one to break the bad news to the West Bank settlers or if someone else will lead us in the next painful phase. Either way, it has to be someone from the right, because in Israel, only the right can carry out the policy of the left.

Settlers and opponents of the evacuation claim that the way Sharon brought about this plan was undemocratic: he dismissed his campaign promises, disregarded his reluctant Likud party, fired two right-wing ministers and refused to hold a referendum on the evacuation plan. His conduct reminds one of the Jewish woman, who, in the darkness of the shtetl, mistakenly prepared the cholent (traditional Shabbat stew) in the night pot. The worried woman asked the rabbi if it was kosher. It is kosher, he told her, but it stinks.

It stinks, indeed, yet it's kosher. It was repeatedly approved by the Knesset, the body representing all Israelis, and by the Israeli Supreme Court. As for Sharon's sudden U-turn, wasn't Menachem Begin elected in 1977 on the slogan of Greater Israel only to give Sinai back to the Egyptians when the historic opportunity presented itself? And anyhow, the settlers, who for decades benefitted from Ariel Sharon's talents when those helped them in cunningly manoeuvring all governments in their favour, should be the last to be surprised and cry gevalt when he suddenly turns against them. As for a referendum, I don't recall ever being asked if I agreed to settling the West Bank and Gaza. I didn't.

At stake is not only the future of the settlements, it's the future of Israel's democracy. Sharon's plan to pull out of Gaza is actually about the ability of Israel to turn the will of the people into political action in a democratic way. The execution of the plan will determine whether the Israeli democracy is still a functional one or a democracy in name only, incapable of implementing its most important decisions because veto power has been surrendered to a few extremists.

In the coming days, many of us will watch agonizing scenes coming from Gaza. However, we shouldn't lose sight of the wider perspective. Stepping into an operating room in a hospital while a patient is being operated on might be a disheartening experience. Yet it is a vital act on the road to recovery. Pulling out of Gaza – and later, out of the West Bank – is likewise vital to the survival of Israel. With self-defined borders at last, the State of Israel, democratic and predominantly Jewish, might be smaller in size, but it will be stronger in spirit, ready to defend itself if attacked or to give a helping hand to the Palestinians once they embark on a peaceful track.

Uri Dromi is the director of international outreach at the Israel Democracy Institute in Jerusalem. From 1992 to 1996, he was the spokesperson for the governments of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres.

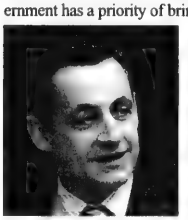
Last Thursday, Sharon met with French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy, who asked how France could help Israel reach an accord with the Palestinians. Sharon said the French should try to persuade PA President Mahmoud Abbas to take steps against terrorism, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Sharon later met with French Jewish leaders.

"The best means to guarantee the future of the Jewish people is aliyah," Sharon told the Jewish audience, according to the Post. "I tell Jews all over the world to make aliyah to Israel. My government has a priority of bringing one million Jews to Israel."



Nicolas Sarkozy

Unlike his earlier statement that so angered French officials, Sharon did not tie his aliyah call to anti-Semitism. Though the number of anti-Semitic attacks in France is down, the previous week saw more anti-Semitic incidents than usual, with attacks in the capital and its suburbs on July 19 and 20.

Then, the Saturday before Sharon's visit, three bottles of hydrochloric acid were thrown at a Jewish school in the 18th District of Paris. No one was injured, though one of the bottles landed inside the school's synagogue while worshippers were celebrating Shabbat.

A 15-year-old and two 17-year-olds were questioned in connection with the attack and have been temporarily placed in juvenile detention. Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy visited the school two days later and announced that "no act of anti-Semitism or racism is a minor act."

"The only strategy" to combat anti-Semitism, he said, is "zero tolerance."

The next day, Sarkozy met with Roger Cukierman, CRIF's president, who thanked the interior minister, the chief of police and the Paris district attorney for their "efficient" pursuit of perpetrators of anti-Semitic acts. He suggested that local governments implement a plan to educate parents of teenagers on racism and anti-Semitism, organize visits to Auschwitz or the Shoah Memorial in Paris, and hold interreligious conferences.

Police chief Pierre Mutz said newly assigned police officers may also visit the Shoah Memorial.

CRIF head Cukierman commends Sharon

Most of them want to live quietly and be an integral part of Israeli society.

"There is a small minority who are active, mostly through the Islamic movement and operated by the Iranians and Hezbollah. It is a small minority, but it is growing and it is not a simple problem.

"They have identification cards like us, the same license plates, and they can't be stopped on the roadsides. The answer to these problems is to bring more Jews to Israel," he said.

Roger Cukierman, head of CRIF, French Jewry's umbrella organization, praised Sharon for his "courageous initiative of leaving Gaza." The chief rabbi of France, Joseph Haim Sitruk, spoke of the importance of Jewish unity.

Israeli named to UN post

An Israeli was named deputy chairman of the UN Disarmament Commission. The Foreign Ministry's Meir Itzchaki will hold the post. The commission is a subcommittee of the UN General Assembly and an advisory body on nuclear and conventional arms.

Vatican snaps back at Israel

The Vatican lashed out at Israel for demanding to know why the Pope left attacks on Israelis out of a recent condemnation of terrorism. "The Holy See cannot take lessons or instructions from any other authority on the tone and content of its own statements," the Vatican said. In a July 24 address, Pope Benedict XVI deplored the "death, destruction and suffering in countries including Egypt, Turkey, Iraq and Britain," referring to a number of recent Islamist terror attacks. Israel's Foreign Ministry called in the Vatican envoy and asked why a July 12 attack that killed five Israelis in Netanya was not included.

Arabs, Israelis work together for clean water

Israeli and Palestinian groups are joining forces to collect and treat wastewater from Tulkarm. The Hefer Valley Regional Council is working with local Tulkarm leaders to clean the water at a Jewish National Fund water treatment centre in Kibbutz Yad Hanna. The project will help prevent pollution of the Alexander River, which the JNF has rehabilitated.

Mission: Moderate Muslims

Israeli diplomats in Europe have been instructed to cultivate ties with moderate Muslim leaders. Red Mansour, a Druze veteran of Israel's Foreign Ministry, said he has been put in charge of the "Islam in Europe" outreach project, to run in concert with longstanding efforts to monitor Muslims who incite against Jews. "The novel element here is that we also want to find the silent voice to give it a mouth and throat so that it will come out, condemn terror, condemn anti-Semitism and connect with Jewish communities as well, for the sake of local civic action," he said.

Salvo in Sderot

Palestinians fired three rockets from the Gaza Strip at Sderot last week. There were no casualties or damages from the salvo. Israel blamed Hamas, but the terror group had no immediate comment. Yediot Achronot reported that Israel plans to equip the coastal city of Ashkelon with a rocket alert system currently installed in Sderot, signalling that Israel fears Hamas could extend its range after Israel withdraws from Gaza next month. The Israeli army had no immediate comment on the report.

Shalom visits Britain

Israel's foreign minister visited Britain last week. Silvan Shalom arrived Monday in London and, in talks with his British counterpart, Jack Straw, and Prime Minister Tony Blair, conveyed Israel's sympathies over the recent terror bombings and support for the country's battle against terror. He also voiced Israel's opposition to a Palestinian Authority plan to include Hamas in parliamentary elections in the West Bank and Gaza.

Another church slams 'wall'

By ANNE KOPPEL CONWAY
JTA

PORTLAND, Ore. — Officials at the Simon Wiesenthal Center are criticizing a Protestant denomination for passing a resolution opposing Israel's West Bank security barrier.

The Disciples of Christ Church passed the measure last week with backing from about two-thirds of the 3,000 members who attended the church's general assembly. The church has 800,000 members across North America.

"The resolution is an ongoing effort to demonize and delegitimize the Jewish state," defining Israel "as the apartheid country in the 21st century," said Abraham Cooper, the associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Wiesenthal Center, an international organization with offices around the world.

The final resolution, which was slightly toned down from an earlier version, claims that the security fence exacerbates hostility between Israelis and Palestinians. It calls on Israel to stop its construction, tear down what already has been built, and pay reparations to Palestinian property owners.

The resolution comes after other votes by Protestant churches criticizing the barrier and weighing divestment from Israel.

Considering that more active means of Israeli defence against Palestinian terrorism – such as incursions, house demolitions or targeted killings – have also been denounced around the world, Israeli officials note that the fence has dramatically reduced the number of attacks by making it much harder for terrorists to enter Israel. That, in turn, has reduced Palestinian suffering by making Israeli counterterrorist raids less necessary.

On July 23, for example, a Palestinian laden with explosives was sufficiently slowed down by the fence that he was caught and disarmed before carrying out an attack in Tel Aviv.

Cooper attended the church's general assembly last Wednesday, along with Tzippy Cohen, a survivor of a September 2003 suicide bombing at a Jerusalem cafe. They had been told that one of them would be allowed to address delegates for up to three minutes.

But when they arrived at the conference, they were told only voting members of the church could speak, Rabbi Adlerstein said.

Yet, when the time for debate ended, church delegates voted to allow an extra two minutes for Rula Shubeita, a Palestinian woman from Jerusalem and a member of Sabeel, a Palestinian Christian group that's leading the anti-Israel divestment movement, to speak.

Shubeita condemned suicide attacks and all other violence. She spoke about the hardships the fence has caused Palestinians and how she must drive 14 miles to see her brother on the other side, and she claimed it's now impossible for her to visit Bethlehem, Jesus' birthplace.

A church official told JTA that Shubeita was allowed to speak because she is part of Global Ministries, which is affiliated with the church.

World Briefs

Paper fires Islamist intern

Dilpazier Aslam, an intern at the British newspaper the Guardian, was fired last month after he insisted on retaining his membership in Hizb ut-Tahrir, a radical Islamic group that's legal in Britain but banned in several European and Arab countries. The newspaper said it considered Hizb ut-Tahrir to have promoted violence and anti-Semitism, and said in a statement that it considered Aslam's "continuing membership in the organization to be incompatible with his continued employment by the company." Aslam, 27, may sue.

Straw slams Livingstone

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw condemned anti-Israel remarks made by London Mayor Ken Livingstone. In the wake of the July 7 terror bombings in London, Livingstone justified Palestinian suicide bombers and compared Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Likud party to Hamas. "There is no and there can be no moral equivalence between a democratic party and its supporters, operating in a democracy that is Israel, and a terrorist organization whose policy is the slaughter of innocent civilians," Straw said last month at a news conference with visiting Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom.

Russians found guilty

Two men found guilty of attacking two Moscow rabbis last January were given prison sentences. A court gave Dmitry Rozanov four years and Andrei Maksin to 18 months for their role in the attack. The court found them guilty of assault and hooliganism, but refused to call the attack a hate crime, saying the men were "unaware of the ethnic belonging of the victims." The rabbis were wearing haredi garb when a group of men attacked them as they walked with one of the rabbis' children in Moscow's Marina Roscha district. The other rabbi suffered severe head injuries and required hospitalization.

Oldest couple are Jews

The world's oldest married couple is Jewish. Philadelphia residents Herbert and Magda Brown, 105 and 100 respectively, have been named the "oldest living married couple, aggregate age" by the Guinness Book of World Records. The couple married in Hungary in 1930 and made their way to the United States during World War II. Magda attributes their longevity to communication. "We never argued, we just had discussions," she told Reuters.

Record payout

The Claims Conference distributed more than $1 billion (US) in 2004, the largest single-year payout in its history, it was announced at the annual meeting of the group's board of directors last month in New York. Of the sum, more than 70 per cent, or $778 million, went to Holocaust survivors. Another $121 million went to heirs of property, and $45 million went to account holders or their heirs through the Swiss banks settlement. More than 10 per cent of the funds went to organizations in 41 countries that care for Jewish Holocaust victims or do research and education.

POSITION AVAILABLE

Rabbi

Ohel Leah Synagogue
Hong Kong

Ohel Leah Synagogue is a Modern Orthodox Synagogue which serves a diverse Jewish community in Hong Kong.

The beautiful synagogue building which dates from 1902 is in a residential neighbourhood and is part of a complex that includes a mikveh, Jewish Community Centre (with kosher grocery and restaurants) and Jewish day school.

The Ohel Leah Rabbi should provide dynamic leadership to the congregation composed of approximately 200 families and single adults from all over the world and who have a variety of intellectual, religious and professional backgrounds. This makes Hong Kong an exciting and dynamic place for anyone who would wish to explore this opportunity.

The ideal candidate should be able to develop the community to its full potential through active participation in services, community activities and education programmes.

The successful candidate should have a centrist philosophy and pluralistic approach to Modern Orthodoxy. He should demonstrate leadership skills in rendering Halachic decisions and in motivating adults and children, and should have significant pastoral experience. A university degree is preferred but not required. Fluent English and excellent public-speaking skills are essential.

The successful candidate will receive an attractive salary, housing and other benefits.

Applicants may e-mail their CV including background, education qualifications and references to Candidates@OhelLeah.org or send by post to: Rabbi Search Committee, Ohel Leah Synagogue, One Robinson Place, 70 Robinson Road, Mid-Levels, Hong Kong.

MORE HAPPY LANDINGS:

Some 330 new immigrants from Paris and Marseille arrived last week in Israel. Director-General of the Jewish Agency's Immigration and Absorption Department, Mike Rosenberg, said that 3,300 new immigrants from France were expected this year, the highest number from that country in 35 years.

The real root cause of terror

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the aftermath of the London terror attacks, the Canadian and international media devoted substantial editorial space to the "root cause" debate – the search for the underlying cause (or causes) of terror attacks carried out by Islamic extremists.

Immediately following 9/11, many on the left blamed U.S. foreign policy, and Israeli policy towards the Palestinians, for causing the terrorist bombings in New York and Washington. This theory still holds sway among some liberal analysts.

On PBS's NewsHour (July 25), Michael Scheuer, the former head of the CIA's Osama bin Laden unit, went so far as to argue that not only is Al Qaeda solely a defensive reaction to the United States, it is bound by love, not hate. Scheuer said: "In many ways, these people are lovers in the sense that they love their religion and they love their society and they deem [U.S.] foreign policy an attack on that… And indeed, as long as Western and U.S. policies in the Middle East remain the same, the growth potential for what you could call Al Qaedism is enormous."

However, an opposite theory – that radical Islamic ideology, not U.S and Israeli policy, underlies and motivates suicide bombings – is beginning to gain popularity. This argument, though not new, is being heard more often in the wake of the July 7 London bombings, which were carried out by "homegrown" English Muslims.

Robert Fulford's column "Islamophobia isn't the problem" (National Post, July 16) described how Britain's "[t]houghtless genial tolerance" of the most radical anti-Western, pro-jihadist preaching by Muslim extremists contributed to an atmosphere in which the London bombings became possible.

In "The triumph of the fundamentalist" (Globe and Mail, July 16), Emran Qureshi reviewed two books on Islam. Qureshi wrote: "It is a terribly facile and naïve assumption to assume that the response of the jihadis is 'blowback' for past and present Western imperialism. It denies the assailant any moral agency." Moreover, "[t]he struggle for the soul of Islam is an intramural contest that is being played out irrespective of Islam-West relations."

Rex Murphy took a different approach in his July 23 Globe and Mail column, "Fanatical minds defy logic." Murphy said efforts to "understand" the terrorists are doomed to failure, as they are "efforts to bring the calculus and standards of responsible minds as instruments to map irresponsible minds that do not acknowledge standards." He argued that terrorism can only be forcefully confronted, not understood.

Others, however, believe that there is a logic to the terrorists' actions. In "Bombing in Egypt fits the terrorists' bill" (Globe and Mail, July 25), Israel-based analyst and author Barry Rubin wrote: "It is a mistake to be obsessed with the motivation of attacks as defined by Westerners, rather than look at what the terrorists say among themselves. Their talk makes it clear that this terrorism is not motivated by the Iraq war or even by the Arab-Israeli conflict but by an attempt to revolutionize the Muslim world and break the West's power."

The Globe and Mail's July 22 editorial "The misguided reflex that it's the West's fault," stated this alternative argument well: "[Al Qaeda's Islamism] cannot be explained by any Western act in the past or accommodated by any Western compromise in the present… Its goal is a sweeping Islamic empire, the Caliphate, where infidels are banned and an austere bond of Islam reigns." And the means to this end is violence and terrorism.

On July 26, at a news conference in London, British Prime Minister Tony Blair challenged those who looked for rationalizations for terrorism. He declared that there is "no justification for suicide bombings whether in Palestine, Iraq, in London, in Egypt, in Turkey, anywhere. In the United States of America there is no justification for it. Period."

A more lucid understanding of the real "root cause" of terrorism may indeed draw an increasing number of journalists to Blair's position.

This extraordinary program is starting to catch on outside Vancouver.

"One of the things we're very excited about is that this is another opportunity to explore how people with mood disorders can… find power, find courage and find the self-esteem to get up and objectify this thing that's happened to them," Liberman says.

She cautions, however, that the program is not a magic cure for mental illness. But she believes it deserves a place alongside traditional therapies.

"Research shows that effective treatment for mood disorders, in the long term, is three-pronged: medications, some form of talk therapy and social support. Stand Up For Mental Health falls well within that third prong," she says.

Granirer is proud of the program and knows it's having an effect.

"Most normal people would never want to do stand-up comedy," he says. "Well, these folks are supposedly less-than-normal, yet here they are succeeding in something that most normal people would never have the courage to do."

The Shabbat Cow

Adapted from the Midrash: Pesikta Rabbasi 14

Justinian pushed his way through the busy marketplace trying to ignore the sounds and smells assaulting him from all directions.

"Fresh onions, fresh onions, the very best!"

"Fine Turkish cloth, purest linen!"

Justinian continued on, intent on only one thing.

"Strong, healthy cow, perfect for farm work!"

Justinian froze. He had found what he was looking for. At least he thought he had. It only took him one glance, however, to discern the truth.

"You call that a healthy cow?" he demanded angrily, gesturing toward the emaciated bovine as he resumed his search.

"Excuse me, are you looking for a cow?" A Jewish peasant was standing off to the side, holding a halter which led to the cow the other seller should have been talking about. It looked sturdy, healthy... just what Justinian was looking for!

I mustn't look too excited, he warned himself, or he'll try to overcharge me. "Yes, I am looking to buy a cow. How much are you asking for yours?"

I don't think you'll have any trouble with her, called the seller after him, "but if you do, you can find me at my farm just south of town... ask for Isaac."

Problems? thought Justinian. Ha! I'm not going to have any problems. This cow is perfect.

And it was. The cow plowed Justinian's fields better and faster than he had ever seen a cow plow. For the next few days, Justinian brought the eager cow out of the barn to begin a new day of work. But one morning, the cow refused to budge.

"Get up, you lazy good for nothing!" howled Justinian, but to no avail. He tried coaxing. He tried bribing. He tried pushing. He tried shoving. He even slapped her. The cow just picked up her head, gave Justinian a chiding glance, and went back to sleep. Justinian stormed over to Isaac's farm, growing angrier and angrier as he went. He threw open the door, barged in and roared, "How dare you sell me a defective cow! Give me a full refund now!"

"Calm down," said Isaac. "Let me come and see what the problem is."

"There's not much to see," complained Justinian as they walked back to his farm, but Isaac just said, "I don't think there's going to be a problem." Finally they reached the barn. The cow smiled at her former owner but did not get up. Isaac leaned over and whispered something in her ear. To Justinian's utter shock, the cow stood up, shook herself off, and obediently trotted to the field.

"I don't believe it," muttered Justinian, shaking his head. "But I still want a refund. I can't call you over to recite your incantations every time the cow refuses to work... unless you teach me the spell."

Isaac laughed. "I didn't use any magic. I just told her that since she belongs to you now, she doesn't have to keep Shabbat anymore."

"Shabbat? What?"

"God gave the Jewish people a special gift called Shabbat. On the seventh day of the week, we rest, just as God did after creating the world in six days. We dedicate this day to God and we don't do any work. Even our animals rest. But you're not Jewish. Now that you own her, she can work on Shabbat. And now that I've told her that, you won't have any more problems."

Whoa, thought Justinian, this cow is closer to God than I am. I have to learn more about God and this Shabbat.

After much study, Justinian became Jewish and changed his name to Yochanan ben Toraita — Yochanan, the son of a cow — in recognition of the cow that brought him to learn about Shabbat.

Yiddish concert featured Beyond The Pale, Smolkin, Respitz

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto's heat wave did not deter more than 1,000 people who attended the annual summer Yiddish concert held this year at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Sponsored by the committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the 24th summer concert, Gems of Yiddish Songs, reflected the traditions of the past and included original klezmer compositions, all performed with technical excellence.

"Yiddish is the heart and soul of the Ashkenazi Jewish community, with over 1,000 years of history and culture to share with our youth," said Sheldon Friedman, the recently elected chair of the committee for Yiddish, in his welcoming speech. Friedman was the principal of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for 15 years.

"It is a story worth telling – a telling of pain, disappointments and struggles, as well as accomplishments, celebrations and successes," he said.

"The committee for Yiddish works directly and indirectly to ensure that such a story is told and understood in Yiddish – our mamaloshen."

Friedman noted the many programs sponsored by the committee – including classes for children and adults and Yiddish courses at the University of Toronto and York University – the endeavours to plant love and knowledge of Yiddish. He welcomed anyone who is interested to become a volunteer.

With her inimitable brand of humour, Susan Jackson, executive director, Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage of UJA Federation, brought greetings from the federation.

"Yiddish is one of those things that transcends time and place," she said. "When we sing in Yiddish, when we dance in Yiddish, we are transported to a different place and a different time."

The concert opened with a lively instrumental by Eric Stein's klezmer ensemble Beyond The Pale. The audience clapped, sang along and danced around the sanctuary to the music. Stein, who plays the mandolin and cimbalom, is a well-known figure in Toronto's Jewish music scene.

At the concert, Stein was joined by Bogdan Djukic on violin, Bret Higgins on bass, Milos Popovic on accordion and Martin Van de Ven on clarinet.

Featured vocalists were tenor Mitch Smolkin, the artistic director of the Ashkenaz Festival, and Janie Respitz, a folklorist and Montreal teacher. She has performed in New York and is scheduled to appear in Buenos Aires and Montevideo, Urugay.

Smolkin opened his part of the program with the freilech A Glezele l'Khayim by Joseph Rumshinsky, followed by Skrip Klezmer Skrip, with an outstanding performance by Van de Ven.

Respitz then sang Mordechai Gebirtig's Kum Leybke Tantsn. The song tells the tale of a shadchan (matchmaker) who wants to fix up a young lady with a boy whose mother has the same name as the girl.

As a duo, Smolkin and Respitz delighted those present with the favourite Tum-Balalayke, to which the audience sang along.

It was in renditions of the love songs Margaritkelekh and Loshn Koydish that the exquisite tone of Respitz's voice was highlighted. And it was her version of Yosl Ber by Yitzchak Manger that brought a particularly appreciative response from those present.

The only criticism that could be heard following the concert was, "We wanted it to go on longer." It was a fine tribute to these performers.

Adler brings Annie Get Your Gun to Massey Hall

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In the annals of the entertainment world, there have been many popular songs, but if one shines the brightest as the industry's unofficial anthem, it is likely the famous Irving Berlin tune There's No Business Like Show Business.

"In my humble opinion, it is one of the most important songs ever written for the musical stage," says renowned producer Stephen Adler.

"When it was originally [performed on Broadway]… the story goes that the audience stood and applauded for eight minutes."

Adler hopes to get just such a reaction to the time-honoured tune when it and other classics come to the stage at Toronto's Massey Hall from Aug. 2 to 20 as part of the musical Annie Get Your Gun.

Boasting one of the longest runs of all Broadway musicals during the 1940s, the production mixes music, humour and romance in its detailing of the life of sharpshooter Annie Oakley.

While a fan of the storyline, Adler says it was primarily the music that prompted him to produce the play.

"I love the music," he says, humming the song Anything You Can Do, a classic from the musical.

"Here's a cast of 25 people, all standing along the edge of the theatre belting out songs you all know."

Adler, 54, has been living and breathing Annie for the past seven months and is optimistic that it will be a hit with Toronto audiences.

"There are no other [major] musicals [here] this summer, a huge number of tourists are coming and it is priced below the vast majority of [similar productions] in a town this size and with this talent," he says.

Annie is played by Tony Award nominee and Broadway star Louise Pitre, best known for her role in Mama Mia! Country singer Billy Ray Cyrus, who gained international stardom for his huge hit Achy Breaky Heart, plays Frank Butler.

Donna Feore, whose professional credits include My Fair Lady and Gigi at the Stratford Festival, is Annie's director and choreographer.

Adler has a co-producer, Tina VanderHeyden, who he says was a fine choice.

"I had a vision, phoned Tina and her reaction, like everybody else, was, 'Oh, OK!'" Adler recalls.

"She and her husband listened to the score and the next morning, she called and said, 'You got a deal.'"

The producers partnered with investors, scooped up top talent and got the rights for the music from the original producers, Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein.

Adler says that the dollars and cents of any play is the biggest part of it. "Show business is one-quarter show, three-quarters business.

"You always have to have a vision and passion for the show, but the reality is the budgets, numbers, the constant negotiation for contracts – all of that stuff, that's the business."

He says trying to explain to people what the show's vision is is one of the most challenging jobs he has. "It's [about] getting the right people together and sharing the vision for this particular show."

But it all usually comes to fruition in the end, he adds.

"I had this little dream about seven months ago … and then all of a sudden, these people are coming to make your dream come true."

No stranger to spearheading big-name productions, the New York-born, Toronto-raised entertainment professional has been involved in Hollywood north and south on both sides of the border for more than 20 years.

"Somebody called me and said there was an ad in the paper for an assistant marketing person at the Toronto Symphony," he recalls.

"Supposedly, 120 people applied and I was probably the only one who knew nothing about classical music. But I thought it was a great challenge, so I applied and they hired me."

The symphony gig lasted nine years and Adler says the experience was invaluable.

"I learned more about this business from my boss [at the symphony] then what I could have learned in 25 years in school," he says.

Adler climbed the ranks and became versatile, honing expertise in public relations, marketing and producing.

He has held senior positions at Toronto's Elgin and Winter Garden Theatre Centre, Bob Banner Associates Television in California and Circle in the Square Theater in New York City.

It was at Circle In The Square that Adler launched a groundbreaking approach to subscriptions, which increased the theatre's revenues more than 120 per cent and has since been emulated by many theatres.

"I had experimented in my head with this concept of two ways of selling subscriptions," Adler says.

"There's the traditional way – where you subscribe for the same seats for each show and get a discount – or you buy a booklet with four tickets and you could redeem them any you wanted to.

"The booklet had coupons with parking and restaurant discounts and advertisements on the back. We made a lot of money and brought a lot of people… This sounds commonplace [now], but it had never been done in New York, 10-12 years ago."

Now that people are buying tickets for Annie Get Your Gun, Adler says all the hard work was worth it. "When people begin to buy tickets, that's the most enjoyable thing. It's the affirmation your idea wasn't nuts."

Annie Get Your Gun opens on Aug. 2 and runs until the 20th. For tickets, call 416-872-111 or visit www.ticketmaster.ca or www.masseyhall.com.

Telefilm Canada invests in its first Israeli movie

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli film director Danny Verete can add one more honour to his list of cinematic achievements.

His latest picture, Metallic Blues, which was screened at the Al Green Theatre in Toronto last month, is the first Israeli movie in which Telefilm Canada has invested.

Based on a true story, and set in Israel and Germany, this full-length feature is about two too-clever-by-half Israeli used car dealers who buy a blue 1985 Lincoln Continental stretch limousine from a former Israeli Arab from Quebec and try to sell it in Germany for a huge profit. Amid a series of mishaps and misfortunes, their scheme founders.

In a recent interview, Verete described Metallic Blues – which won an Israeli Academy Award in the best-supporting-actor category and was nominated for prizes in four other categories, including best film and best screenplay – as a comedy that morphs into a tragi-comedy.

A commercial hit in Israel, where it has been playing for the past 18 weeks, it cost about $2 million (US), a relatively piddling sum by most standards.

Israeli investors, both public and private, contributed about $1 million. Germans threw in approximately $450,000, while Telefilm and a Quebec group, Sodec, invested some $400,000. Given the tight budget, Verete had only 24 days to shoot the film.

Telefilm got involved due to Montreal producer Suzanne Girard. Having been impressed with one of Verete's previous films, Yellow Asphalt, which turns on a cultural clash between Jews and Bedouins in the Judean desert, she recommended him to Telefilm.

Telefilm, in particular, liked the Canadian angle in Verete's script. When the Israeli car dealers, Shmuel (Avi Kushnir) and Siso (Moshe Ivgy), first set eyes on the automobile they covet, they notice its Quebec license plates.

Danny Verete

When Telefilm executives asked Verete, 53, whether he had deliberately planted the Quebec plates in his script for their sole benefit, he admitted his ploy.

"I did it to raise their interest," he said almost sheepishly.

Verete, who was born in Jerusalem, the son of a Hebrew University history professor who was a specialist in the 1917 Balfour Declaration, wrote Metallic Blues to explore German-Jewish relations, a subject that fascinates him.

"We're inundated by the Holocaust in Israel. It's our mantra."

In a reference to Israel's Holocaust memorial/museum in the hills of Jerusalem, he observed, "We're graduates of Yad Vashem."

In making Metallic Blues, a 21st-century road film, Verete adhered to self-imposed guidelines. He did not want to dwell on conventional themes about Jewish Nazi hunters zeroing in on their quarry, Holocaust survivors returning to their former homes or children of survivors searching for their roots in Europe.

"My characters, very simple people, go to Germany on a business trip, full stop." In the process, they discover the meaning of friendship and reconciliation, but they pay a heavy price for discovering these fundamental truths.

The story was inspired by Verete's best friend, a car dealer who thought he could make a killing by selling a limo in Germany.

That set his mind racing, and soon Verete – who does not hold third- and fourth-generation Germans responsible for the crimes of their fathers and grandfathers – was absorbed in writing Metallic Blues.

Verete, a seasoned pro, wrote the script for Daniel Waxman's 1982 feature, Hammsin, which some critics hailed as the finest Israeli film of the decade. It is about a conflict between Jews and Arabs over land ownership.

Verete's second feature, Yellow Asphalt, which was released five years ago, won a special jury prize at the Mediterranean International Film Festival in Cologne, Germany.

In 1997, he wrote and directed I Am Your Spy, a documentary on Mordechai Vanunu, the Israel nuclear technician who was imprisoned for 18 years for spilling Israel's atomic secrets to the Sunday Times of London.

A graduate of the Hebrew University who majored in history and psychology, Verete was a budding novelist when the film industry beckoned in 1980. "Suddenly, a friend asked me if I wanted to work in a film."

He started as an assistant property master and then became a property master and an art director.

In 1981, he wrote and directed Wall Within a City, a 35-minute short about two Jewish boys lost in the entrails of eastern Jerusalem. It was screened at the San Francisco Film Festival and on Israeli TV. Four years later, he wrote his first feature, Koko Is 19.

Since then, Verete, the father of two teenage girls, has produced a succession of television movies and commercials.

He is sanguine about the state of the film industry in Israel. Salaries in the industry tend to be low, but Israeli directors and scriptwriters, as well as technical crews, are getting better all the time."We're moving forward. There is light at the end of the tunnel."

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN: ABRAHAM CAHAN, MAN OF THE PEOPLE

"Dis a choych?"

These three little words, which appear in Abraham Cahan's sparkling story The Imported Bridegroom (1898), may be one of the most sublimely funny and ironic utterances in all of modern Jewish literature.

The story opens with the unmarried Flora idly reading Little Dorrit, as her wealthy father, Asriel Swoon, prepares to visit Pravly, his childhood shtetl. Once there, he pays an astronomic sum to secure the rabbi's son Shaya as a bridegroom for his daughter. Besides being an exceptional talmudic scholar, Shaya is a charming young man of marriageable age.

"The nearer Asriel, with the prodigy in tow, came to New York, the deeper did Pravly sink into the golden mist of romance, and the more real did the great American city grow in his mind."

At first Shaya and Flora are like oil and water, but once Shaya becomes acclimatized to America and agrees to Flora's wish that he secretly study medicine, the two are betrothed. Eventually Asriel hears troubling rumours about Shaya – he has become an "epikourus," he smokes on Shabbos, he hasn't attended synagogue in weeks – and begins to shadow him. Seeing Shaya disappear inside an imposing edifice, Asriel is ready to believe the worst. "Dis a choych?" he asks a stranger in stunned disbelief, reflecting Cahan's wonderful ear for street cadences.

"A church? No, it's a library – the Astor Library," the stranger replies. Shaya has plunged into the vast ocean of gentile learning. America soon turns him into a proponent of Positivism and a passionate member of a weekly debating circle on Harriet Martineau's Auguste Comte, a text he considers sublime. Not even Flora can command her darling fiance's attentions any longer. Asriel, with bitter resignation, elopes to Palestine with his housekeeper. Such is how even the purest gold gets tarnished in America.

As evidenced both in his classic novel The Rise of David Levinsky (1917) and in his brilliant stewardship of the Daily Yiddish Forward, which he edited for half a century (until his death in 1951), Cahan was always keen to depict the world as it was – not glittering with romance but tarnished by the gritty realism of daily life. Even in his early novel Yekl, which became the basis for the movie Hester Street, he wrote about what he saw around him, not what he wished could exist in a better world.

Many Jewish readers who had worked their way into middle- and upper-class American society were appalled by the baseness evident in some of his ghetto characterizations, as in Yekl.

"If you want to describe the Jews to Americans, why not describe the best of us, instead of choosing this low, coarse, immoral tenement fellow?" one lady wrote to him.

"My dear madam," he replied, "I chose Yekl because he and his tenements seem to me more interesting than even the best Jews uptown."

Cahan had helped found the Forward in 1897, then left for greener journalistic pastures. In his absence, the paper lapsed into a struggling socialist feuilleton, filled with long theoretical articles about socialism that preached and shouted at the few readers it managed to attract. Beseeched by the paper's collective management, who offered him complete control to do as he saw fit, Cahan returned as editor in 1902.

His first edict was to order the staff to abandon their pompous German style and write in plain Yiddish. Next he jettisoned all abstract discussion of socialism, and he replaced an essay on Karl Marx with a lively piece on Jewish students at New York City College – it carried a socialist message between the lines.

Although labour's struggle with the capitalist bosses remained a key focus, Cahan added more American news to the paper and presented it without the usual socialist slant. He also included cultural reviews, translated stories, and articles that interpreted American institutions and life. Presented in the homely "mamaloshen" of the streets, the paper's new dynamic mix aroused immediate excitement. Readership soared from 6,000 to more than 225,000.

Abraham Cahan at his desk.

As in his literary works, Cahan filled the Forward with colourful scenes of everyday life as it was, not as it should be, and vigourously defended his editorial stance. When an article on the compulsion of Jewish mothers to equip their children with pocket handkerchiefs provoked some of his comrades to ask what handkerchiefs had to do with socialism, he replied, "Since when has socialism been opposed to clean noses?"

Perhaps his most famous innovation was the Bintel Brief, a column devoted to the ordinary problems of the people; Cahan called it "the book of life." One typical early letter came from an old Orthodox mother, lamenting that her son refused to say Kaddish for a recently deceased father. "I beg him; for weeks I cannot sleep. But still he refuses. He says he would be a hypocrite if he said Kaddish, because he does not believe in God. What can I do?" In reply, the paper orders the son to say Kaddish at once. "It will do your mother good, and so, when you go to the synagogue, you will not be a hypocrite, but only a kind son who is comforting a broken old mother."

Like a latter-day Moses and Aaron wrapped up in one, Cahan played a key role in public issues, was a gifted orator, and sometimes faced the people's wrath. In 1912, he urged the settlement of a strike, and an angry mob broke some of the paper's windows. Dauntless, he turned to address the crowd but suddenly collapsed. He was rushed to hospital and survived a serious operation.

Convalescing away from the daily grind of the press room, he began writing The Rise of David Levinsky, a work that had been on his mind for years. Written with his characteristic attention to everyday life, it is filled with fresh observations on the customs, thoughts, concerns and manners of Jewish Americans in the Gilded Age and early 20th century. Today it is recognized as a classic of Jewish immigrant fiction, and Cahan, deservedly, as a Jewish literary great.

More than 700 exhibits

the scroll, the charter between the Israeli and his land was sustained through a document."

"The New Hebrews" is a thematic and chronologically arranged show of more than 700 exhibits divided into 15 themes. It tells the history of modern Israeli culture from its emergence 100 years ago to the present.

Upon entering the first room of the exhibition, you are immediately drawn to Shmuel Hirzenberg's huge mural The Wandering Jew.

Zoltan Kluger's photo Workers coming back from the field is representative of the idealistic artwork of the 1930s and '40s.

Based on the 17th-century legend of the Jewish shoemaker condemned to wander forever for taunting Christ on the cross, this striking image showing a man crazy with fear, leaping into the unknown as crosses impale naked corpses on the ground, symbolizes the terrible period of pogroms in eastern Europe.

At once, this painting sets the stage for the theme of "The New Hebrews," since the persecution of Jews gave rise to the Zionist dream to return home.

From the pogroms of eastern Europe we head into exhibits on Zionism and the First Fruits.

The years 1919 to 1925 brought thousands of young Jews to Palestine. The art produced during this period reflects the new immigrants' desire to integrate into the Arab world. They saw themselves as less European than Eastern.

The art displayed shows Israelis proudly wearing traditional Arab kaftans and headdresses. It wasn't until after 1929, with the growing conflict between Arabs and Jews, that there was a dramatic reduction in artwork with Arabic themes.

The section on the theme Utopia – The New Man portrays the propaganda-like artwork popular in the 1930s and '40s, reminiscent of Soviet and fascist propaganda of the time.

Presenting "The New Man" in an idealistic, socialist manner, this exhibit centres on pictures of muscular men with pickaxes in hand, conquering the soil. Artists portray willing, athletic, handsome farmers proudly tilling the land. The message is clear: in this new land, a new man will arise, free of the shtetl stereotype dominant in Europe.

Other themes include the Shoah, religion, immigration, war and conflict.

In War, a series of surreal photographs by Adi Ness dominate the room. One of these photographs is a depiction of the famous Last Supper painting, showing a group of Israeli soldiers eating their meal in the famous Da Vinci pose. There is nothing subtle about this; for these soldiers, this may very well be their last supper.

Probably the most controversial display is Detail, a short documentary by Avi Mograbi. It shows an Arab mother being prevented from taking her sick daughter to a hospital outside her village. The Israeli soldiers, safe in their armoured vehicle, refuse to allow them to leave or to allow an ambulance to come in to pick them up.

The Palestinian woman consoles her daughter by cursing the Israelis, assuring her that Allah will take care of them.

For an exhibit on Jewish art, especially one in Europe where anti-Israeli sentiment runs deep, this is especially brave.

But curator LeVitte Harten says this was intentional. The idea was to show that as a democratic nation, Israel does not hide from self-criticism.

"The idea that Europeans are pro-Palestinian does not make them anti-Semitic, nor anti-Israeli," she says. "Given that most artists in Israel carry this opinion, it is natural that they will express it in their work. It makes no sense to exercise censorship, and if we do not show it, will the truth of the situation evaporate?"

Tragic, comic and everything in between, this exhibit successfully portrays the history of Israel through the eyes of its artists.

It is unfortunate that because of space restrictions (it takes up 20 rooms), "The New Hebrews" will probably not be seen anywhere else.

Farewell, Babylon* by Naim Kattan, Raincoast Books.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Naim Kattan's bittersweet memoir, Farewell, Babylon, examines an Arab country where Jews dwelled for 25 centuries.

There, as they went about their lives, they witnessed the rise and fall of empires, caliphates and colonial powers.

Kattan was born in Baghdad in 1928 and immigrated to Canada in 1954. He left Iraq in 1947, and has not returned. In this book, first published 29 years ago and recently re-issued with a new foreword, he guides a reader through the permutations of its social boundaries.

Iraqi society was highly stratified and was based on religion, ethnicity and class. These lines and divisions were rarely breached. However, since Muslims constituted the vast majority of Iraq's population, they were understood to be more equal than Christians and Jews. This was the case even though Jews arrived in what is now Iraq before the advent of Islam.

Kattan and his friends, who considered themselves worldly and cosmopolitan Iraqis, gradually learned that this fact of life was carved in stone.

As he puts it, "In our group we were neither Jew nor Muslim. We were Iraqis, concerned about the future of our country… Except that the Muslims felt more Iraqi than the others… We were different…"

One's identity could be discerned in an eye blink. "We had only to open our mouths to reveal our identity," he writes early on in this pungent memoir. "The emblem of our origins was inscribed in our speech."

Kattan's family resided in Baghdad's Battawiyeen district, far from their old neighbourhood where Bedouin traders would come with their camels once a week to unburden them of sacks of grain.

To Kattan, the Muslim world seemed strange, exotic and hostile. "When a Jewish mother reprimanded her son, she would call him a Muslim," he observes. "The Muslim mother returned the insult by calling her offending son a Jew."

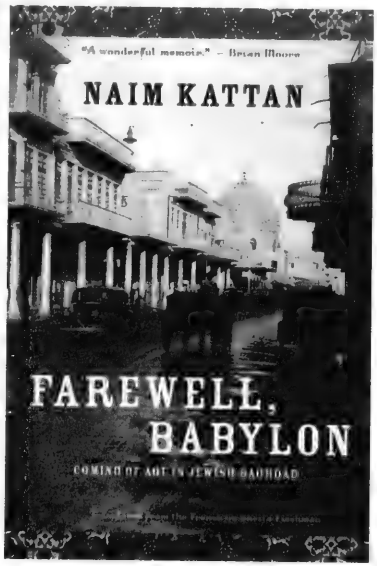
The commonest of pursuits could be dangerous in a divided city like Baghdad. Consider this tidbit from the author: "I had never ventured into a movie theatre by myself. As I was a Jew, the young boys of my age, Christians or Muslims, would have attacked me with kicks and slaps."

Despite the threat of such violence, Jews were basically left alone. But in June 1941, following a failed coup by pro-German army officers, a pogrom, known as the farhoud, erupted in Baghdad, spearheaded by Bedouins.

He describes it in detail.

"Armed with picks, daggers, sometimes with rifles, they unfurled in waves… As they passed through, they brought along Muslims [and] spared the Christians. Only the Jews were being pursued. As they advanced, their ranks swelled, teeming with women, children and adolescents who ululated as they did on great occasions such as weddings and feasts."

For the Jewish community, the farhoud was clearly a turning point. "With the restoration of order, the Jews came out of their numbness and stupor and began to plan for the future."



From that point onward, emigration was their number 1 priority.

In the meantime, Jews had to adjust to new realities. Jewish civil servants, such as Kattan's father, brother and uncle, had to relearn Arabic, which they had spoken only in a degraded form of a dialect. The edict was a source of humiliation to his father.

As the situation deteriorated still further, Jews applying for senior level positions in the civil service had to prove beyond a doubt that they were indispensable and that no Muslims could replace them.

And at Baghdad University's faculty of medicine, a place was allotted for only two Jewish students per annum. Wealthy parents had to send their sons abroad. "We learned painfully that our participation in building the country was required only where it was seen to be indispensable," he notes.

He and his Jewish friend, Nessim, enrolled in a Muslim school to improve their Arabic, whose rhetorical wealth they valued. They soon realized that their enthusiasm for Arabic was not shared by their teacher.

"He would question the whole class about a grammatical ambiguity or a complicated figure of speech," he recalls. "Nessim and I were usually among the first to raise our hands, pointing out with joy that we held the key to the mystery.

"The teacher never called on us. He persisted in ignoring our eagerness to declare our attachment to our common heritage and unconsciously rejected the tribute we were burning to pay to his teaching."

Yet Farewell, Babylon is not just an unrelieved chronicle of doom and gloom. Consider Kattan's amorous adventures. In accordance with local tradition, he lost his virginity in a house of ill repute.

His account stretches over several pages, but in a typical passage, he writes:

"She was naked. Never in all my dreams had I imagined a woman so resplendent in her beauty, so filled with poetry. I held out my hand towards her, timidly, touched one breast, then the other. She laughed to encourage me and then began to stare at my passive virility. She held me in her arms, caressed me. Everything happened in a cadence that took my breath away."

But within 20 pages, we're hurtled back to the grim political status quo in Iraq.

Kattan tells of the media war against the "Zionists" who were plotting the theft of Palestine. Community leaders proclaimed that Jews were not Zionists, but to no avail. "Protests of patriotism, professions of nationalist faith, did not calm those who, in greater numbers every day, questioned our loyalty to the Arab nation."

Jewish communists were in the forefront of denouncing Zionism. But they, too, were lumped together with Zionists.

Amid the rising climate of anti-Zionism, the government enacted anti-Jewish restrictions. "Henceforth, there was a curious quality to any project that might result in fixing us on our native soil. Only plans for leaving seemed final."

He fared well in Canada. He edited the Bulletin du Cercle Juif for the Canadian Jewish Congress, published books, wrote literary criticism for Le Devoir and, for 25 years, headed the writing and publication section of the Canada Council.

The Cinderella Man of the online world

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

In the fickle world of online business, a person can go from being a dotcom millionaire to becoming bankrupt in a click of a mouse.

After having been a dotcom millionaire who lost it all as quickly as he earned it, Yack managed to claw his way back to run an online business that is a true Canadian Jewish success story.

Yack, the brains behind fabuloussavings.com – a website designed to assist local businesses in getting a strong online presence and offering incentives to customers – compared his road to success to that of Jim Braddock, the boxer depicted in the film The Cinderella Man.

Braddock, an ex-prizefighter who had it all before the Great Depression hit, was considered down and out after he suffered a number of losses both financially and in the ring. But he proved everyone wrong when he took on the heavyweight champion of the world and won.

"I'm like the underdog," said Yack. "There were months where we had no money."

Because of these hardships, because his success did not come easy for him, Yack is grateful for the good fortune he enjoys today.

Michael Yack, the founder of Fabulous Savings, is seen next to a poster in his office that advertises his pride and joy. [Benji Feldman photo]

"We started from humble beginnings and because of that we have an appreciation for the Internet and making it work," he said.

And it's the way that Yack is able to make the Internet work for his clients that is the "secret sauce" of his business.

He said Fabulous Savings creates an online presence for both local merchants and online businesses by manipulating search engines to get them highly placed on their lists, and offers coupons.

"What we do is called pull marketing. We don't push. The paper pushes, the radio pushes, we pull. We concentrate strictly on search engines, so when someone's looking for something on a search engine, not only do they find what they are looking for, they get an incentive they never would have expected.

"That's what everyone wants to know, is how do you get on top of Google," said the eccentric entrepreneur who prefers to work in the dark, with only the glow of the computer monitors emitting light into his spacious office.

He added that this service is in such high demand that Harvard University offers a course to teach its students how to manipulate the search engines the way that Yack does.

This technique, coupled with coupons that consumers can only get if they shop through Fabulous Savings, is the secret to Yack's success.

"We have coupons for more than 1,200 online merchants. The same thing we do for local businesses, we do for online businesses and it's working extremely well to say the least," he said. "It's fun because when you're shopping online, not only do you find exactly what you're looking for, but you get, like, 25 per cent off."

What makes it so unique, he said, is that the incentives that he offers are for goods and services that you could never get coupons for in the past.

"You can get a coupon to get your house renovated or your house painted. Skydive Burnaby – you can get a discount to kill yourself," he said.

Fabulous Savings didn't begin to thrive overnight, but Yack drew from past experiences to make this service attractive to both buyers and sellers.

"I used to get deals on everything, just from talking to people and whatnot. While running a marketing company, we came up with this idea just so my friends would stop bugging me about where to get things," said the 34-year-old Thornhill native.

"We put up a website, and this was prior to the Internet becoming what it is today. We spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on traditional advertising that didn't work and we were broke. We had no money and then we figured out how the search engines work and that was the key.

"You know, it's very easy to build and put up a website, but if no one finds it then what's the point?" he asked.

What began as a local venture funded entirely by Yack and his family that catered exclusively to Toronto merchants has grown into a word-of-mouth phenomenon that American corporate companies are beginning to get wind of.

"Macy's is my client, Wal-Mart is my client, Target is my client, Uggs is my client, Sony's my client," he said.

Within the next year, he plans to open offices across Canada, and within the next three years, he hopes to have a presence in every major market in North America.

Although he anticipates the expansion into the rest of the continent, he emphasized how important the local merchants are to him.

Yack expressed his concern that mom-and-pop-run businesses that thrive within their communities might fall prey to the big-box stores and online companies if they don't change with the times.

"There's a migration right now between the old world and the new world and people don't realize it. When they do realize it, it's going to be too late," he warned.

"It's not like you're just competing against people in your city – you're competing against people all over the world. With bookstores, you'll buy a book where you can save half the money. There's no more loyalty in the industry."

After struggling through years of debt, Yack, who said he has a passionate love affair with the Internet, was able to make it work for him.

"So far this year, I've pushed over $1 million in sales, which is pretty cool from a little idea. We're the superstars of the industry when it comes to Internet marketing."

The self-proclaimed natural entrepreneur, who used to make a buck by buying and selling working at flea markets and selling on eBay, is thrilled that he gets paid to do what he loves.

"I'm like Tom Hanks in the movie Big. I come to work and I play online every day."

Brooches are a girl's best friend

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

It only took a compliment from Oscar-winning actress Renée Zellweger to push a creative, young woman to turn her hobby into a business venture.

Avi Leigh

"I was walking through the Horseshoe Tavern and the first compliment I got was from Renée Zellweger," Bader said.

"She walked up to me while I was standing at the bar by myself and she grabbed my hand and she said, 'Oh my god, I love your ring.' She wouldn't let go of my hand."

After that chance encounter, Bader decided to send Zellweger complimentary jewelry through her assistant while she was filming in Toronto.

"From that I ended up getting a bunch of press," said Bader, who has done a spot on eTalk Daily, and radio station 102.1 FM.

Since she first presented her wears at the annual Clothing Show in Toronto, she now creates vintage brooches, earrings, necklaces and even purses that can be found at trendy Toronto boutiques such as Over the Rainbow and Gypsy at Bayview Village.

While she said that making one brooch is a long process as they are all hand painted and usually include her photography, she loves what she does.

But the photographer in her warned her not to make herself choose between one passion and another.

"I like having my hands in a bunch of different things. I love fashion and I love photography and I love making things.

"I see them as not just jewelry, but as art pieces because the brooches are my own photos, so it's like you're wearing a little canvas."

Bader was influenced by her mother, who loved to accessorize with brooches. Once she rediscovered a fraternity pin she had inherited from her grandmother Pearl, and found the materials she had been searching for, she let her creativity take over and began her collection called Pinned by Avi Leigh.

While brooches and vintage jewelry may be trendy, Bader said that to her the brooches are sentimental and not a short-term fad.

"Brooches were really trendy and popular last year, but I think they have staying power. I think it's original," she said.

"You know, it seems everyone and their dog has a line of jewelry, but mine is a little different and I put a little bit of my art into it and there is nothing out there like it."

It is for this reason, Bader said, that people all over North America have shown interest in her work. Ever since she did some press with Famous Magazine, a Canadian entertainment magazine, people from Vancouver, Montreal, Edmonton and even Los Angeles have shown interest.

Canada's Irwin Cotler was under the spotlight at last month's Maccabiah Games, but this time it was sports and not politics that brought attention to the federal justice minister.

Decked out in a Canadian red and white jersey, Cotler, 65, attracted a large crowd to his match in the masters category, and he won the first game 11-9 against Israeli masters champion Menachem Stein with a powerful cross-slam.

But the experienced Stein, who is 15 years younger than Cotler, quickly recovered, winning three straight games 11-4, 11-7 and 11-5 to take the match.

"You win if you participate, that's my motto," Cotler, surrounded by his family, told Canadian Press. "For me, competing here was fulfilling a childhood dream. I was just worried that I didn't come over here for comic relief."

"I thought I would surprise him, maybe shake him up, but I really don't think he was ever worried," Cotler joked. "Now, I'm hoping to get him to coach me and return in four years for another opportunity."

Stein said the justice minister was a bit rusty.

"He's a courageous man," Stein told CP. "I could tell that he has other things to keep him busy and didn't come across as if he played too much. Still, his first game was a good challenge."

Cotler said his trip to the Middle East would also include a meeting with justice ministers from Israel, Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority.

Speaking to Ha'aretz, he joked that the media coverage he received during the games, "is a lot more positive than what I get in Canada."

Reflections on Maccabiah 2005

By MIRAY CHESKES-GRANOVSKY
Special to The CJN

I have just returned from the Maccabiah Games in Israel, where my husband David competed in masters tennis.

The Games showcased top Jewish athletes from 55 different countries competing in an impressive array of sports. From soccer to table tennis, gymnastics to judo, it was inspiring to watch the strength, skill and determination of our athletes from around the world.

I was amazed by the countries represented at the Games. When thinking about world Jewry, countries such as Finland, India, Panama and Turkey don't generally jump to mind.

On our way to the opening athletes' party, we were fortunate to share our bus ride with the Indian cricket team, some of whom wore kippot and kept the long ride amusing by singing David Melech Yisrael.

The tremendous achievements of our athletes were rivalled only by the overwhelming camaraderie that existed between them.

At the opening ceremonies, I was struck both by our diversity and by our unity as Jews.

Seven thousand athletes from a multitude of cultural backgrounds and varying levels of religious observance were united by their shared Jewish roots and support for Israel.

The stadium was packed to capacity for the opening ceremonies, with 40,000 people cheering, singing and dancing as the athletes paraded onto the field.

And despite the attempts of Islamic Jihad to disrupt the Games with a suicide bombing in Netanya the next day, only one athlete out of 7,000 withdrew from the competition and flew home.

When the athletes weren't training or competing, they could be found trading their Maccabiah clothing for the uniforms of athletes from other countries.

My husband, who is as skilled in negotiations as he is in tennis, returned home with clothing – ranging from socks to jackets to hats – from 10 different nations.

During the negotiation process, a great deal of information was exchanged about Jewish life in different parts of the world. The same positive sentiments were expressed repeatedly by many of the athletes about the glamour of participating in the Games in Israel, the bonds felt with fellow Maccabiah participants and the thrill of meeting Jews from every corner of the globe.

For me, the Maccabiah Games trumps the Olympics, and I left the Games with heightened pride as a Jew and confirmed optimism about the importance of "being Jewish" to Jews around the world.

Different, yet similar

Last month, the most pressing issue on my mind was choosing between a pink dress or black pants to wear to a party I was going to, all in the name of a cute boy I'm seeing.

Another twentysomething also had pressing issues on his mind last month. Shahzad Tanweer, 22, was planning to blow himself up along with as many London commuters as possible, all in the name of martyrdom.

By SANDIE BENITAH

Worlds apart, yes. But are we that different?

One news agency described Tanweer as a "fun-loving, rich kid" who drove a Mercedes, played sports and loved being a university student.

My brow furrowed. I quickly scanned the article again, thinking I might have jumped ahead to a story about a David Goldberg from Thornhill.

Then I read that Tanweer had recently started embracing his religion and had travelled to the Middle East to learn about his culture and heritage.

Hmm. I'm pretty sure I read the same thing in an e-mail from my buddy Avi before he went on a birthright israel trip.

Déjà vu? Of course not, but there's no denying that in some scary way, my friends and I have more in common with this monstrous murderer than we do with our own parents.

Let me explain.

My interest in the conflicts haunting Israel began in earnest in university, as conversations with friends drifted from Brad Pitt to world issues before drifting back to Brad Pitt. We were becoming somewhat more mature and more aware of the world that our parents had warned us about.

I remember two incidents in particular at Ryerson University, where I was a student.

One afternoon, I was walking around campus and a man with a warm smile handed me a newspaper. I smiled back, looked down and saw a screaming headline about "apartheid in Palestine" and "atrocities" committed by Jews. I threw the paper back at him, shocked, scared and disgusted. My friend and I alerted campus officials immediately and asked that this man be removed. I remember fighting back tears the entire time, wondering what, if anything, I could do.

Soon after, Sept. 11 happened and my class assignment that day was to write an article about reaction at our school to the terror attacks in the United States. I interviewed the head of the Palestinian student group on campus, but before I did, I set my cellphone ringer to the highest volume so he could hear Hatikvah, the Israeli national anthem, loud and clear as told me about all that is wrong with Zionism.

My parents tried to warn after each of these incidents, telling me that the best defence is education, and fighting back with facts and reason rather than stupid stunts. They said they didn't want me to get into trouble – or worse, into a dangerous situation. I dismissed them as being typically overprotective, and I continued to hold fast to my twentysomething zeal for what I believe in.

Not every suicide bomber is in his or her twenties, and certainly not every zealous twentysomething will even think about doing something as atrocious as what Tanweer did, but we are undeniably excitable and that can be a problem, too. I'm not sure what it is about us twentysomethings, but I see myself saying and doing things all the time to prove that I've found my voice and, more importantly, to show that I have a voice. But as I get older, I have to question what kind of voice that is.

There's no question that Tanweer's voice had an impact on the world, yet it hasn't advanced it in any way. The western world is not more sympathetic to his cause. All he has done is re-affirm the belief in the war on terrorism. My actions at Ryerson, though quite tame compared to his, also did not change anybody's mind about Israel. I'm not equating our actions, but I am saying that voices like ours, whether they be relatively meek or rather extreme, end discussions instead of creating them, and they halt progress and prevent peace.

Of course, we can't help but be impassioned. We are finally beginning to understand and take part in this world. But I hope that my voice will learn to speak passionate words of truth and hope instead of anger and revenge, and that, in the end, there will be no similarities between us and cold-blooded killers.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband and I were invited to a bar mitzvah in New Jersey. We live in Toronto and left work early on the Friday so we could be there to join in the festivities with our family.

When we arrived, to our surprise, there were no festivities. Nothing had been arranged for any of the out-of-town guests for dinner. Some of the guests were shomrei Shabbat and literally had nowhere to eat.

I thought this was disgraceful. There were only a few of us, but the only arrangement that was made was to suggest a hotel to stay at so we would be close to the shul.

The whole bar mitzvah started on a sour note.

The only meal that was arranged was the luncheon after the bar mitzvah.

After the affair, we changed our tickets to leave earlier than we had planned. Is it unreasonable to feel this way?

Neglected Out-of-Towners

Dear Neglected Out-of-Towners,

I'm sure that opinions on this subject are endless and that everyone does things differently. However, my feeling is that if you are already making a simchah, go all the way.

Why would someone leave out-of-town guests to fend for themselves, especially when I assume most of them were there for Friday evening.

A gift basket could have been left in their rooms with a welcome card, some fruit, a little nosh, and some information about the area such as restaurants, sights to see, etc. But the one thing I would have really enjoyed as a guest is a Friday night dinner with my relatives. After travelling for many hours, it's nice to relax and have things arranged for you.

It's possible that money was tight and your hosts couldn't afford to feed every out-of-town guest for another meal. At the very least, however, they could have made reservations for you at a restaurant.

The bottom line is that out-of-town guests make a great effort to rearrange their lives for a short time to come to simchahs. It's up to the people making the affair to make their guests feel comfortable and wanted.

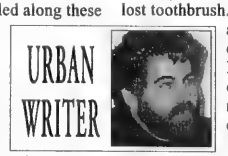
Camp Northland: a forever experience

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Many of the roads in Haliburton run through Eden-like highlands with pre-Cambrian rock formations, where every fissure or crack in the granite surface has a sprouting plant, a fern or a pine seedling.

Late last month, as I travelled along these snake-like roads on my way to visit my buddy Burt, the mashgiach who oversees kashrut at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, I imagined campers bouncing up and down in the traditional camp school bus, some singing and others staring nervously out the window worried about making friends.



When I arrived at Northland, a "community camp" that's owned and operated by the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto (JCC), I was warmly welcomed by Ellen Nash, director of Northland and the JCC, and Stephen Polevoy, the camp's business manager and assistant director. Their reputation of being disciplined yet thoughtful camp managers and community leaders preceded them, and I was impressed by their combined camp experience of more than 50 years.

We shmoozed for a while in Ellen's office, interrupted once by a camper reclaiming her lost toothbrush. It quickly became clear that, as with all great teams, a powerful symbiosis exists between Ellen and Stephen, one developed through years of collaboration, and a love for the camp experience, youth and Judaism.

As an ex-camper myself (I went to a Lubavitch boys camp in 1968), memories came flooding back to me, and I became as inquisitive as master detective Jacques Clouseau.

How big are the grounds? Northland covers 750 exquisite acres. How do you feed hundreds of kids three times a day? With very tasty food and in two separates shifts, with alternative meals for vegetarians. How do you ensure a home-away-from-home atmosphere with healthy human interaction? By banning cellphones, portable DVD players, iPods, Blackberries, Walkmans or computers – basically, anything from Future Shop.

Northland is predicated on the fundamental Jewish values of chesed (kindness) and tzedakah (justice). As we toured the camp, Ellen, with obvious pride, told me that the JCC distributes more than $200,000 in subsidies each summer to ensure that Jewish children of all backgrounds can enjoy camp – which, a colleague once told me, makes a greater and more lasting impact on youth than do most other organized settings.

We walked the paths, some of them beaten out over the years by young romantics sneaking about on late-night rendezvous. The grounds and resources are superbly maintained by Rob Abbs, the camp's chief maintenance professional, and include 58 cabins, well-equipped lakefronts, a rock climbing wall, an adventure sports course, and one awesome camp radio station run by Toronto funkmaster David Weiss.

Later, I took a stroll on my own, frequently stopping to ask campers and staffers their feelings about camp. Staff members, some of whom were back for their 15th season, expressed sentiments such as, "These are the greatest weeks of my year" and "Camp is my second home." Some individuals had come from as far away as England, France, Mexico and the United States.

I continued to amble along, spotting the requisite boondoggles on campers' wrists and names such as "Ken Sugar" (canoe staff 1975-76) and "Steve 'Little Jew' Goldberg" scrawled on cabin doors and beams. I realized then that what Ellen and Stephen had told me back at the office was right. Camp is magic, and anathema in many ways to our wired existence in the city. It's a summer oasis where youngsters get to enjoy a shared lifestyle filled with unbridled fun while learning leadership skills and making lifelong friendships.

This column is, therefore, a tribute to every camper – today and through the years; to the Northland staff and campers of 2005; and to Ellen and Stephen, masters of their craft and memory-makers for thousands of Jewish youth who have ridden that bouncing school bus through the wooded entrance to this extraordinary paradise.

ALL IN GREEKTOWN, ALL YOURS TO ENJOY!

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

2005 Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth focuses on healthy eating, healthy lifestyle

Doctors and scientists around the world are talking about the Mediterranean diet — low on cholesterol and fats and high on taste. This year's Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth, which takes place Friday, August 5 to Sunday, August 7, picks up on this theme, offering healthy foods from Greek and other Danforth restaurants and new health-inspired activities and events.

Chris Trahiotis, Chair of this year's festival life and owner of Ouzeri Restaurant, thinks the focus on health and fitness is a perfect fit. "A traditional Greek saying is 'live life as was meant to be lived', says Trahiotis. "This year's Krinos Taste of the Danforth will help you find ways to do just that, in North America's largest GreekTown."

Over 80 restaurants are planning to take part, offering tastes from their menus reasonably priced from $1 to $5. As you explore the food of the Danforth, you can also take part in activities with Toronto sports teams, get health advice, and even cheer on participants in Toronto East General Hospital's Bed Dash.

Health of mind and soul is also high on the program, with three stages active over the weekend. The Scotiabank Stage at Logan Avenue will feature great music from rock to the Toronto Symphony Orchestra to the National Band of the Canadian Naval Reserve. New this year is a taste of great theatre, including Tony 'n Tina's Wedding.

The Visa Stage at Playter Avenue will feature music and the popular Visa Fashion Show, including high couture to casual wear from close to a dozen Danforth merchants. This show is brought to you by the talented folks at Fingerprints, with their own eclectic children's line and a knack for special events; expect something special this year!

The Greek Stage at Pape features traditional and modern Greek music and dance, and is a great way to experience a little Greece in Toronto. Use your VISA card at participating merchants along the Danforth and you could WIN a trip to Greece compliments of World of Vacations. Need to sit down for a moment? The beer gardens near the Stages all feature Amstel and Heineken — Greece's most popular beers — and Ouzo 12. Speaking of Greece, do you want to call Greece for FREE? Drop by the Vonage booth. Also new this year is the Skyy Vodka Martini Garden located at Danforth and Ferrier in the heart of GreekTown.

This year's midway is bigger and better than ever. Sensodyne is hosting an ice-cream eating contest and Pepsi's "Get Spotted Team" will be awarded prizes along the Danforth all weekend long.

Alex Alexakis, President of Krinos Foods, expects this year's Krinos Taste of the Danforth will be the best yet. "Every year this event gets better," said Alexakis. "And this year, with a focus on the healthy benefits of the Mediterranean diet and an active lifestyle, we are offering visitors a valuable gift – a long and happy life. Opa!"

Sharing the taste of Greece at Mezes

Sharing the taste of Greece with its customers, and accordingly celebrating family and culture, is the definition of Mezes' appeal. Consistency, quality, and freshness have been the anchors of its success.

For years Mezes has been enticing patrons to choose from a markedly extensive menu of its namesake: small, appetizer-sized portions of deliciousness meant to be ordered in multitudes and collectively enjoyed by the table. In fact, this communal style of dining, which is as authentically Greek as the gastronomy, serves to uniquely heighten the experience at Mezes.

"It makes for a convivial meal," says Mezes proprietor Sue Zindros. "It stimulates conversation, sharing good feelings as well as food, and it encourages people to try new things."

Hungry diners, in Sue's experience, tend to order familiar things, or "comfort food". Mezes encourages diners to blend the familiar with the new. The fact that everything at Mezes is made fresh from scratch, with the finest natural ingredients, is added incentive to experiment.

Seafood abounds on the Mezes bill of fare. Certainly try the tender grilled octopus, or the shrimp prepared one of three ways: broiled and crusted with garlic; surrounded by fresh vegetables and splashed with lemon; or baked with feta in a tomato sauce. The fish, broiled whole and drizzled with the best olive oil, is embellished only by the promotion of its own natural flavour. Dolmades — grape vine leaves embracing a delicate mixture of rice, ground beef, and dill — remain one of the most popular selections. The tender lamb chops, ordered by the piece or as an entrée, have inspired quite a following of their own. Vegetarians will delight in a vast number of menu items, among them the Gigantes — lima beans slow cooked with garden vegetables and fresh herbs in a tomato base.

For the summer, Mezes has a covered, luxuriously curtained, waterproof pavilion that extends the warm, candlelit setting of the indoors right out into the street. The attention to detail at Mezes — from the service to the cookery to the creation of memories — is truly what makes every day and every meal, a celebration.

Astoria signals future of Greek dining

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." For over 30 years, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Astoria recently underwent a major renovation that has seen it emerge brighter and roomier than ever. If it shone before, now it positively sparkles. A nouveau rustic take on traditional Greek motifs unfurls in rich golds and maroons, with elegant tile underfoot and soaring sky blue overhead.

Company Director Peter Kerasiotis undertook the renovation with a view to embracing the needs and tastes of a new generation of diners while remaining mindful of Astoria's long-standing clientele. "Many of our original guests are still regulars three decades later," he notes. "They rely on us for their family outings and special occasions, and it's their loyalty that has allowed us to grow."

The essentials — freshness, quality, and friendly personal service — haven't changed. Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. And what souvlaki! Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Astoria was also rated "Best Greek International Restaurant" by Where.

Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite grilled sea bass and salmon steaks — and Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location and dual outdoor patios (still the Danforth's largest, and now among its brightest as well!)

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to GreekTown" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

Christina's crown jewel of Danforth

For truly authentic, upscale Greek cuisine, live entertainment and star quality, no restaurant shines quite as brightly as the effervescent Christina's. Outside, its year-round patio is the spot to eat, greet, see and be seen — an epicentre of Danforth activity. Inside, earth tones, buttercup yellow and turquoise form a soothing backdrop for historical Greek etchings.

Christina's is ideally suited for intimate private functions such as Bar Mitzvah parties, and also does a brisk business catering to special events.

Christina's star power is such that you might find yourself sitting next to Robert De Niro. Or Bette Midler, Whoopi Goldberg, Jim Carey, or Paul Anka. The same high standards of cuisine and unique ambience that have appealed to these luminaries (sans pretension, sans high prices) will gratify you too.

The formula is simple, the commitment total: fresh, homemade Greek recipes, prepared lovingly, one meal at a time.

In addition to wonderful mainstream Greek fare such as succulent leg of lamb and moussaka (both traditional and vegetarian), you'll find specialties such as Kolokithoketedes — minced, mildly spiced zucchini patties with potato, onion and parsley, gently pan-fried to golden crispness. The assorted dip platters (Pikilia Mezedakia, cold; Christina's Pikilia, hot & cold) are teeming and delicious.

Fish and seafood are delivered fresh daily. Choice abounds; there's even a Seafood Souviaki, with large, marinated chunks of calamari, shrimps and scallops, grilled to perfection.

The portions are generous, the wine selection vast, the service impeccable.

Live entertainment on weekends includes belly dancing and a two-piece (bouzouki and guitar) Greek band playing a blend of old and modern Greek tunes. There's nothing like a rendering of Never On Sunday or Zorba The Greek to tug at your heartstrings and whet your Greek appetite. On Sundays, a delightful continental brunch featuring many traditional favourites is served.

Enjoyed inside or out, the GreekTown experience doesn't come any better.

Big Carrot's commitment to organics & service repaid by customer loyalty

How do you remain the leader in an increasingly crowded field? By stocking your shelves with products that are as good for the environment as they are for your customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. From humble beginnings in 1983, The Big Carrot has grown into metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living.

Organic, GMO-free, Kosher products

Wilde Kosher Juices are a hit with customers

Run as a worker owned co-op since its opening, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. As it happens, many of these products are also Kosher.

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market, a wholistic dispensary, and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

The Big Carrot's well-versed staff can help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot has it.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome noshery, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher — or a combination thereof. The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher products include Crofters Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; tomato products from Utopia, also Ontario-grown; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Neil's Prepared Soups; Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Cold Mountain Miso; Jersey Farm Non-Dairy Soy Yogurt; cookies from Organica; Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; selected products from Eden Foods; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods.

The Big Carrot carries a tremendous variety of healthy desserts and sweets. Tropical Source Kosher chocolate bars, made in Israel, are available in several delicious flavours. Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups are popular mainstays, as are Bob's Red Mill packaged grains, cereals and baking goods; the Big Carrot stocks both in abundance.

The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold. From the Organic Lentil Daal to the Organic Couscous Salad, every item is a taste and visual treat. It also offers a selection of sinfully delicious desserts without the sin, since they're free of refined ingredients.

The Big Carrot's Wholistic Dispensary, located across the courtyard, constitutes a store in its own right. Among other Kosher products, it carries Omega Flax Seed Oil and selected Solgar Supplements.

Of Toronto's growing number of juice bars, The Big Carrot's is the only one that's 100% organic, giving you, in a quick pit stop, the optimum high-octane fuel. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats. Popular blender drinks include Zen Berry (banana, blueberries, orange, vitamin C crystals, bee pollen, flaxseed oil, and protein powder) and the Energy Elevator (carrot, spinach, raspberry, Ginseng). This isn't just juice, it's a meal replacement.

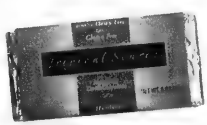
Among the sandwiches, try the Grilled Tempeh, lettuce, tomato, red onion & honey mustard mayo. Fresh, delicious and wholesome — just as Nature intended.

For a summer treat, enjoy Mapleton's organic ice cream, as well as Cool Hemp, a Kosher, organic non-dairy dessert available in a cup or wholesome organic waffle cone.



Tropical Source bars from Israel are organic & Kosher

Through its continuing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. If you want the word "stress" to disappear from your vocabulary — at least temporarily — shop here.

Pan leads Danforth taste parade

Now in its second full year under the direction of Chris and Soula Christodoulou and their son George, the ever-innovative Pan on the Danforth sports a festive new look — golden on the outside, cozy fireplace inside — but its Greek / Mediterranean cuisine takes you on the same magical taste ride it always has.

Cited as "one of the city's best" Greek restaurants by Toronto Life, Pan continues to deliver consistently superb quality across an array of dishes that are deliciously different — sometimes subtly, often dramatically — from other versions you'll encounter.

Pan is open for lunch as well as dinner, and is a prime destination for intimate gatherings.

The appetizers and dips tell you immediately that at Pan, you're home. Try the Baked Goat Cheese encrusted with pistachio, placed over tomato and a portobello mushroom cap and served with wild greens. Also recommended are the Avgolemono Soup and the Marinated Beets. The dips still lead the Danforth parade in flavour and presentation.

The menu complements holdover signature dishes with compelling new offerings. Try the Char-Grilled Loin of Lamb with fig and orange glaze and the Santorini chicken, or the filet of Atlantic Salmon with Madagascar mussels, a skewer of shrimp in a white wine lemon dill cream sauce with garlic mashed potatoes and pan seared vegetables.

The Black Angus New York striploin still tops the heartiness scale; it's served with garlic mash and grilled portobello mushrooms, finished with Madagascar peppercorns in a brandy-beef reduction sauce.

Pan caters to an international clientele liberally sprinkled with movie stars and other show business personalities, but friendly, down to earth service is still the rule here.

Vibrant as ever, Pan continues to reward guests with an elevating dining experience.

Sher-E-Punjab: pioneer still reigns

The recent explosion in popularity of East Indian cuisine has seen items like samosas and pakoras offered as fast food on a growing number of menus — even those of some mainstream restaurants.

For the true connoisseur of this genre, however — for the perfectionist who insists that each dish, each item be prepared slowly, lovingly, one by one — there's still only one place that unfailingly fulfills these expectations.

SHER-E-PUNJAB RESTAURANT
351 Danforth Avenue
416-465-2125

The soulful strains of the sitar greet you as you enter. The deep, rich earth tones of Indian slate tile — reddish brown, copper, a hint of gold — are exotic, yet peaceful. Magnificent tapestries, hand-woven in Rajastan, adorn the butternut-yellow walls.

You're not even seated yet, and already you've begun to experience the tranquility that is Sher-E-Punjab.

30-year legacy of Northern Indian home cooking

For Amar and Malkit Singh (and recently, son Jaspal), this is more than a restaurant; it's a 30-year legacy of fine Northern Indian home cooking. They've not only shared wonderful flavours, but also touched guests with their gentle demeanor and quiet dignity.

Widely reputed for its Butter Chicken, Chicken Tikka Masala, Pakoras and Samosas, Sher-E holds the distinction of making Toronto's finest Naan bread — a soft, oval loaf that's best served hot. But be forewarned: it's addictive! Hand-made on the premises, it is baked fresh virtually on demand — every 15 minutes or so, at busy times — and delivered piping hot to your table. The experience of seeing it emerge from the massive Tandoori clay oven is surpassed only by the pleasure of eating it. This, truly, is manna from heaven.

Saag — a pureed mixture of spinach, broccoli, and rapini — is prized by Sher-E's customers for its unique combination of sharp and mellow tastes. The ever-popular Daal (pureed lentils) and Bartha — barbequed eggplant with green peas — are also first-rate.

If you can put down the Naan bread long enough to order dessert, try the refreshing Kulfi (Indian ice cream). Indian Tea – strong, sweet, and mildly spiced — is a piquant complement to any meal or dessert.

Those unfamiliar with Northern Indian cuisine tend to associate it only with curry. To be sure, you'll enjoy fine curried dishes here, made from scratch with the freshest, hand-blended spices; but this is only a very small part of the culinary picture. Sher-E-Punjab completes the tableau with elegance and grace, and with the kind of personal attention, respect and warmth that's only found in a long-established family business.

Nowhere is the multicultural appeal of the Danforth better exemplified than at Sher-E-Punjab, and those who visit it are in for a richly rewarding experience.

Pantheon sets standard for fresh fish

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. How fitting that in this, the year of the Athens Olympics, you have that same opportunity at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown.

The spectacular decor sets the stage for a royal feast. In the East wing, creamy white floor tiles etched with gold offset walls alive with colourful murals and capped with finely etched wooden trim. In the West wing, rust-coloured tiles and a working fireplace effect a similarly regal ambience. The tables, bedecked with crisp linens in white and gold, are flanked by real wooden chairs.

Pantheon's ever-growing clientele has allowed it to double in size while retaining its charm, intimacy and culinary excellence. Though its mainstream Greek cuisine compares favourably with that of other Danforth restaurants, fresh fish from Greece is what keeps Pantheon's loyal following coming back in droves. Whole sea bass, striped bass, red and white snapper, orange roughy, black porgy, salmon, red mullet, sea smelts — the variety is incredible, the preparation impeccable. As one major daily noted, "Above all, small fish imported from Greece, such as anchovies and baby sardines . . . demand repeat visits. [This lovely fish] is what sets Pantheon apart from most Toronto Greek restaurants."

OPEN 11 AM – MIDNIGHT, 7 DAYS
www.pantheonrestaurant.com
"... a winning charm ..."
"... fresh fish, care with good products and little razzmatazz nudges Pantheon ahead of most competitors ..."

Chef Nick Paroussis — who, with partner John Troupis, is responsible for maintaining these lofty standards — clearly understands the need for delicacy and refinement when preparing fresh fish. Likewise for the fresh Ontario lamb chops, which can be enjoyed on their own or as part of a substantial mixed grill.

Mouthwatering homemade desserts provide a fitting conclusion to your meal. The traditional baklava is enticing, as is the homemade Greek honey cake — "as golden and desirable as an Olympic medal" (Toronto Star).

Smart couples agree: leave it to them

For generations, smart husbands have made "yes dear" an integral part of their vocabulary. For the past seven years, however, an increasing number of smart couples have made "leave it to us" their expression of choice.

"US" refers not to the bride and groom, but to the husband-and-wife team of John and Joanna Pagonis, partners in Leave It To Us Weddings.

LEAVE IT TO US
WEDDINGS
824 Danforth 416.778.7771
www.leaveittousweddings.com

This fast-growing company, which now has 25 employees and is moving in August from its current location at 824 Danforth to larger premises nearby at 1672 O'Connor Drive, is a wedding service provider with a difference. Unlike many planners who merely subcontract out services, Leave It To Us arranges all the services IN HOUSE.

That's right: invitations, photography, videography, DJ, flowers, limo, cake, and more — all under one roof.

The opportunity to make these arrangements in the same place and at the same time is incredibly convenient for the bride and groom. It can also be incredibly stressful for John and Joanna, especially when weddings are dropped into their lap at the last minute.

"Our record is three days," says John. "The couple came in on a Wednesday and got married on the Saturday, with the works — photography, flowers, reception, you name it." Obviously, says John, "the more lead time the better, but we'll work with whatever you give us. Our name isn't "Leave It To Us" for nothing."

The stress is offset by "the satisfaction of making it work for all parties concerned. We worry about the details so you don't have to," says Joanna. And the ability of Leave It To Us to supervise all the components of a wedding has other benefits for the bride and groom, she notes: "By keeping everything in house, we maintain tight control on quality. We have to. If anything goes wrong with any detail, there's no passing the buck ... it stops with us."

If you like running around town attending to all the details, more power to you. If, on the other hand, you'd prefer to hand over this weighty burden to someone else and spend more time actually enjoying the process of getting married, Leave It To Us sounds like the best invention since modern psychiatry.

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction; at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

So how does the Messini version of gyros rise above the rest?

- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Green guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

MESSINI AUTHENTIC GYROS

445 DANFORTH 416-778-4861 WWW.MESSINI.CA

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $8.25, lunch specials from $5.60. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

Got high speed Internet and high landline phone bills? Try Internet phone service.

It probably occurs to you every time you e-mail someone in another area code that it would be nice to be able to call that person for the same zero cost. And you'd probably be thrilled to pay a nominal monthly fee for that privilege.

Now you can — with Vonage.

Vonage, a telecommunications firm that came to Canada in April 2004 and has more than 700,000 customers worldwide, is one of the first companies in Canada to offer VOIP (Voice Over Internet Protocol) technology. This isn't just thinking outside the box; it's thinking with a brand new box — an open box without sides, top, or bottom.

Simply stated, VOIP technology sends your voice call over the Internet as a data file. Yet Internet phone service is not that different from the phone service most of us are used to today. You still make and receive phone calls the same way you used to, and you continue to use the same touchtone phone that's in your house today. The only difference is in the money you'll save every month, and in the great features you'll get. What's more, the people you call will never know you're using a digital phone service, because call quality is crystal clear.

So if you have high-speed Internet at home and want to save money, Vonage Internet phone service may be for you. Do you make a lot of long distance calls? Are you tired of the outrageous cell-phone or long-distance charges incurred when you travel? Do you have a talkative teenager at home that keeps your phone line busy for hours on end? Are you a snowbird, or do you have kids away at college or university? Then you are a prime candidate for Vonage Internet phone service.

Example 1. If you're planning to travel this year, with Vonage you can throw your adapter in your suitcase, plug it into any touch-tone phone and high-speed Internet connection anywhere in the world, and voilà, you'll be calling family and friends all over North America without paying long distance. Plus your family and friends can call you on your home phone line while you're travelling just as if you were at home — with no additional charges or long-distance costs.

Example 2. Your son is in law school at UBC, and the phone bills are astronomical. As a Vonage subscriber, you can get a second phone number with a B.C. area code for $8 a month and you and your son can call each other 24/7/365 for that eight dollars. That's right: UNLIMITED calling for an additional $8 a month.

But it gets better. If your son is also a Vonage subscriber, you can call each other for FREE anywhere in the world. Whether he's attending Yeshiva in Jerusalem or working in Tel Aviv, you can talk 24/7/365 for free. Gratis. Bechinem.

Even if only one of you is a Vonage subscriber, that party can still take advantage of competitive international rates, such as 6¢ a minute to Israel and 4¢ a minute to England, France, and Italy.

According to Joe Parent, Vonage Vice-President of Marketing & Business Development, the biggest factor in a customer's decision to switch from their traditional landline service to Vonage's VOIP service is not the price — the numbers speak for themselves — but understanding the technology.

"We get a lot of calls from people saying that it's too good to be true, and asking what the "catch" is. There's no catch. We're using the same communications channels which carry your e-mails around the world to carry your voice signals. If you do a lot of long distance calling, compare your last three phone bills with what it would cost you to use our service for the same period. And we include free of charge most of the features that are "extras" with other companies."

And how. Virtually all the useful additional features that mainstream phone companies nickel and dime us to death with are standard with Vonage. In Vonage's Premium Unlimited Plan, for example, $39.99 gets you:

- Unlimited calling anywhere in Canada and the United States;
- Free Voicemail, Call Display, Call Return, Call Waiting, Call Forwarding, Busy Call Return, Touch-Tone Service, Caller ID Block, Call Transfer, and more.

No nickel and diming

That's a lot of phone service for $40 a month. Vonage is so confident you'll be happy with their service that — unlike most companies which offer attractive rates only with a long-term commitment — Vonage has a no-contract policy and a money-back guarantee. "We have to earn our customers' loyalty each and every month," says Parent. "If you try us out for one month and you don't like us, you can walk. But if you do the math", he grins, "chances are you'll stay on board."

Vonage is available online at vonage.ca. If you order online, you'll pay a one-time shipping fee of $19.99 Cdn. to have your voice adapter shipped to you, plus an activation fee of $39.99. For Saul Korman, retiren

Saul Korman has a one-track mind. Would someone please tell him that My Back Pages is not only an advertising position request, it's also a song by Bob Dylan?

Ironically, the lyrics of Dylan (née Robert Zimmerman, a lost-again, found-again Member Of the Tribe) do apply to Korman, who appears to be taking literally the intimation that "I was so much older then, I'm younger than that now". For a man well past what many of us would consider a natural retirement age, Korman continues to roar along — louder and stronger than ever.

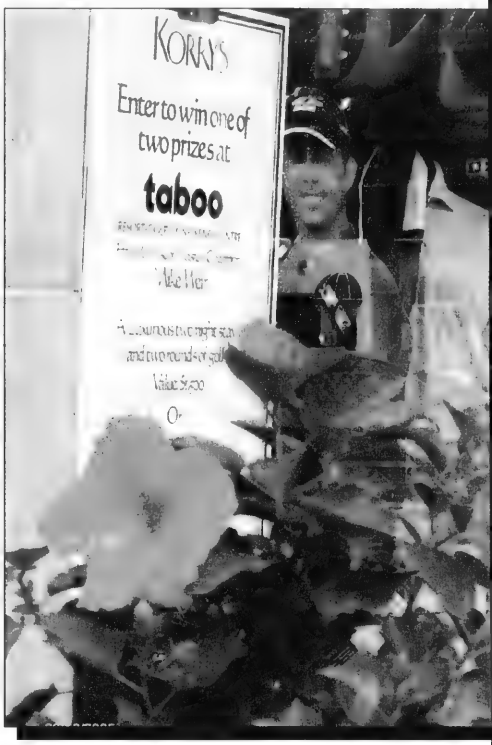
The radio spots, like the man, are ubiquitous. He's been in business for over 50 years, yet tune in any radio station and you'll hear him screaming for more tailors, more salespeople, more Danforth, more GreekTown.

That's what happens when you sell more Boss, more Canali, more Arnold Brant, and more Roberto than ever before.

A vision for the street

Korman adlibs his radio commercials, live from wherever he happens to be when they air — often from his cell phone. "My radio spots are prepared fresh from scratch — just like the food in GreekTown," he chortles.

Ever the promoter, Korman credits suppliers like Hugo Boss and Canali for supporting his marketing efforts to the hilt. "They understand that there's something special going on here in GreekTown." He also lauds media suppliers like "the Fan, CFRB, all the radio stations, the National Post and The Canadian Jewish News with their special GreekTown sections — everyone who realizes that this isn't just another area."



Window on a man's heart: "I love my

His knees are no longer his own, thanks to a "made-to-measure two-for-one" courtesy of St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital (do the promotional wheels ever stop turning?), but his personality certainly is. Irrepressible, over-the-top enthusiastic, he wears his heart on his immaculately-cuffed sleeve.

What keeps the juggernaut going? What makes a man who could easily walk away walk in at seven in the morning?

What makes "retirement" a four-letter word?

"I love my business. I love fabric. I love clothing. Just being around it gives me goose bumps. To me, a suit is a living thing. Just being here, in the calm of the early morning, with my merchandise ... I love my wife Myrna dearly, but clothing is my mistress."

"Fashion, love, intrigue ... the European way"

But his passion for fashion is only part of the story. The luxurious fibres that make his day are inextricably intertwined with the fabric of the GreekTown experience. Just mention "GreekTown", then try getting a word in edgewise.

"Stores all over the city go to such lengths to create a European ambience", he exudes. "We don't have to create it; it's built in. Where would you rather walk — in circles around a shopping mall, or along a European street? We've got world class clothing — never mind us, I'm taking Maxi and Labiri here. I'm talking world class food stores like Sun Valley and The Big Carrot. World class restaurants everywhere you turn. And the cafés! What makes an area so attractive to a company like Starbucks that they would open not one but two restaurants within a few blocks of each other ... have you seen the big new one east of Pape? What makes every chain from Tim Hortons to Mamma's suddenly feel that they have to have a presence in GreekTown?"

wife Myrna, but clothing is my mistress"

On the subject of chains, Korman has mixed feelings. On the one hand, he says, their influx is "inevitable, and they contribute to the area." On the other hand, "it saddens me to see rents go up to the point where the little guy can't afford them any more." Yet he remains confident that ultimately, GreekTown will retain its unique ethnocultural character. "There are enough independent Greek restauranteurs who continue to pass their family tradition on to the next generation. They aren't going anywhere. And just as important, their children take pride in following in their parents' footsteps ... you can't pass the torch if there's no one to take it up."

RRY'S

When he first set up shop on the Danforth some 50 years ago, Korman had a vision for the street — one he retains to this day. "I see the street closed to traffic permanently. I see mothers zigzagging across the street with their baby carriages. I see the big-box stores blending in seamlessly with the small family businesses. I see fruit and flowers everywhere. And I expect to see this in my lifetime."

As one of Toronto's foremost purveyors of the Hugo Boss, Canali and Strellson lines, Korry's has long championed the virtues of dressing for success. Vindicating his stand is the recent movement away from business casual and back to the traditional suit or jacket and tie. The sport jacket is stronger than it's ever been; it carries effortlessly from business meetings to casual luncheons to sipping ouzos in GreekTown. "This is the European way" beams Korman. "You simply cannot go wrong with a classic sport shirt and a sport jacket. If you're too warm in the afternoon, take the jacket off and slip it over the back of your chair, or — even better — sling it over your shoulder. "Ever looked at that famous Ruth Orkin poster?" he beams. "American Girl in Italy? It's fashion, love, intrigue all in one. That's the European way ... that's what we cultivate here."

Black is still the leading power colour, with taupe coming on strong. Don a crisp, classic white shirt under an exquisitely styled Boss or Canali jacket — mixed and matched with a pair of black, taupe or beige slacks — and you're not just ready for the Orkin poster, you're in it.

Korry's homegrown Arnold Brant label, featuring avant-garde styling and high-end fabrics at approachable prices, continues to flourish. And his in-store Roberto label — the focal point of his ever-popular two-for-one promotion — remains a magnet for men throughout the GTA and beyond seeking cutting-edge quality with unbeatable value.

Community involvement a priority

Community involvement continues to be a focal point of activity at Korry's. Korman co-sponsors the annual Toronto East General Hospital Golf Classic, and is a driving force behind the annual Taste Of The Danforth, which raises money on behalf of many worthy charities.

"We've got the best gig in town here to start with", he crows. "The best restaurants. The best cafés. So for three days, the money you're going to spend here anyway goes to charities that desperately need it. If that isn't a win-win situation, what is?"

Even as he speaks, a customer leaves with both Boss and Canali in hand. No wonder these garments are flying out the door; they just look so much better on your back than on the rack.

As you stroll through GreekTown, resplendent in your new threads, feeling like a million bucks, it hits you: you were so much older then, you're younger than that now.

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

Plenty to woo your senses

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

A solid community with solid values

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

THE PALACE RESTAURANT
416-462-1166

Among a royal selection of appetizers, the Hot Mezze Platter (Kalamari, Grilled Octopus, Loukaniko, and Bifteki) is a meal in itself; the Cold Mezze Platter (Tzatziki, Taramosalata, Melitzanosalata, Kalamata Olives and pickled beets with pita) is similarly lavish.

Among the soups and salads, the Avgolemono soup — chicken and rice broth finished with gently whipped egg & lemon juice — is the essence of delicacy, the Greek salad crisp and generously portioned.

The Rack of lamb and moussaka are standard-bearers, and The Lamb Kleftiko's divine combination of lamb, feta cheese, sweet bell peppers, onions and mushrooms is enticingly ensconced in crisp phyllo pastry.

The Palace is also highly reputed for its fresh fish; try the Grilled Swordfish Steak with lemon and herbs, the Whole Broiled Sea Bass, or the Atlantic Salmon Steak. Whatever your preference, you'll find it here, prepared to the absolute maximum of its flavour.

As befits a Palace, there's a private Party room for up to 100 people. Located on the upper level, it's ideal for birthday parties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah parties, or any event requiring the kind of ambience a banquet hall simply can't provide.

Chef Napoleon and the staff go to great lengths to ensure your comfort and satisfaction. A visit to this culinary kingdom is pure pleasure; nobody does Greek like The Palace.

Home cooking lives at Kalyvia

Think of the best home-cooked meals you've ever tasted. Probably they were (or still are) your mother's. Maybe your grandmother's. Sitting down at that dinner table was one of the most pleasurable experiences you've ever had.

That's the kind of homemade taste you can expect at Kalyvia, served up in gargantuan portions worthy of any doting mother.

This is particularly true of the combination platters (poikilias) of seafood and meat, priced from $25.95, which are so big you need a road map just to get around them. Teeming with a variety of Greek specialties, these platters are more than just food ... they're a symbol of the bountiful GreekTown dining experience.

KALYVIA

WWW.KALYVIA.COM

If you're a fish and seafood lover, you can cut your travel time to Greece by about 14 hours. Try the garides (shrimps sauteed in white wine sauce) or the salmon steaks topped with Kalyvia's own homemade lemon sauce, which also garnishes the broiled Red Snapper. Like everything else at Kalyvia, all the dips and sauces are made fresh daily from scratch.

How much better does this taste than prepared food? It's like comparing your mother's cooking to fast food: no comparison.

Founders Mike and Peter Tsafatinos are both from the Greek town of Kalyvia; when you name your restaurant after your home town, you've got a culinary legacy to live up to. These lofty standards for quality and freshness have earned Kalyvia a four-star rating from Toronto by Night Journal.

While Kalyvia's cuisine is authentically Greek, it's a family place that caters to appetites of all ages. Kalyvia's Makaronada (Greek-style spaghetti), available in a variety of entrées and as a side alternative to rice or potatoes, will appeal to the kids, and it's a fun way to introduce them to Greek cuisine.

The Tsafatinos' sons Jim and Jim, and a host of other family members, ensure that each and every dish emerges from the kitchen brimming with the homemade taste their customers expect.

Kalyvia's homemade goodness can be enjoyed on the premises, or in the privacy of your home or office. Large enough for substantial gatherings, but configured for intimacy, Kalyvia is ideal for birthday parties, Bar Mitzvah parties, and other special events.

Kalyvia is one of a very few places in Toronto where you can still enjoy the tastes and trappings of home in a family restaurant environment. It has "Mom" written all over it.

Myth is prime party destination

Myth, which has consistently garnered rave reviews for its avant-garde Mediterranean cuisine, has also become one of Toronto's leading special events venues.

Today's Myth is actually a restored theatre with theatrical mystique intact, complete with a loft-style mezzanine that hosts some of Toronto's most upscale private parties. Architecturally, it's a glorious fusion of Greek, Far Eastern and Italian motifs, outrageously hurled together in a rich palette of gold, black, copper, maroon, and pewter. Improbable on paper, it works spectacularly well in person. With palatially high ceilings and enthralling sightlines, Myth is fronted by gigantic, articulated glass garage doors that unfurl to accommodate the Danforth's most lively patio.

Myth has achieved ultrahip status while maintaining a firm grip on the warm hospitality and consistently high quality that are the underpinnings of any fine restaurant.

The menu is traditionally Mediterranean, but like the decor, it melds influences from further afield and offers delightful departures from the culinary mainstream. For example, there's the French Lentil soup with ginger, lemongrass and parsnips in vegetable broth with smoked tomato pesto and a dollop of garlic mashed potato. Eclectic vegetarian offerings include Imam Biyaldi (currants, pine nuts & saffron pilaf stuffed in purple eggplant with melted onions & tomato). Among the mains, try the Portobello Moussaka (layers of potato, sweet peppers, chickpeas, zucchini and goat cheese baked in a roasted purple eggplant with oregano, basil, tomato and kefelotiri béchamel).

Myth now offers brunch on Saturday and Sunday, salsa on Thursday night, and live Greek blues on Friday night.

Its size and cutting-edge chic have made Myth a prime destination for Bar Mitzvah parties and other catered private events. If you haven't yet enjoyed this Myth-ological dining experience, one visit will corroborate everything you've heard and read about it. That's Myth — and reality.

"Myth sets a new standard on the Danforth ... by which everything else will be measured" — Sara Waxman

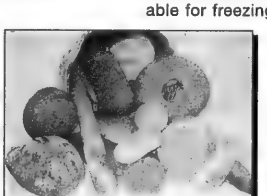
Select Bakery evokes childhood memories

A bakery is not merely a place where bread is made. It's a symbol of sustenance that evokes treasured memories of still-warm goodies emerging from the oven with a maternal blessing and simultaneous admonishment not to overindulge.

Nowhere is this symbol better exemplified — and brought to life on a grand scale — than at Select Bakery. Huge (5,000 sq. ft.) yet intimate (GreekTown's only bakery with a dedicated seating area), its majestic array of baked bounty is to the palate what surround sound is to the ear. Enhancing its seductiveness is the colour scheme (tan on caramel on chocolate) and a refinement of presentation worthy of the illustrious cafés of Europe after which it's modelled.



Select BAKERY

info@selectbakery.ca

The father-and-son team of Emmanuel and Kosta Katsamakis, with a combined 50 years of expertise in baking, lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktoboureko, petits fours et al) is complemented by exceptional European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

Further distinguishing Select is its prepared foods. No time to cook? Moussaka, pastitsio, Greek-style lemon oregano chicken — and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are prepared fresh daily for your dining pleasure. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.

But we digress from the baked temptations. Among the highlights at Select are:

- European Village Bread: crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside;
- Kalamata Olive Bread: as good as it sounds. Buy two;
- Chocolate-covered baklava: a hybrid pioneered by Select, it picks up where "to die for" leaves off;
- Mille feuilles: Select's version makes a good run at the proverbial thousand sheets, each one shatteringly good.

Bakeries are the stuff of childhood longing; each is measured against our favourites of yesteryear. This bakery belongs in that Select group.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Athens Pastries redefines taste buds

It's easy to recognize Athens Pastries and Pies, with its cheerily distinctive mosaic tile facade of silvered turquoise and gold. Once you've ventured inside, however, the taste sensations you'll experience will leave it etched in your memory far more than the visuals.

You've undoubtedly tasted, and probably enjoyed, the traditional Greek spanakopita (spinach pie), cheese pie, meat pie and bougatsa before, but until you've sampled the Athens versions, you haven't truly experienced them at all. Simply stated, it's like comparing homemade fresh-baked bread as your mother used to make it to the store-bought variety. For freshness, crispness, and flavour, no comparison is even possible.

The Athens version will permanently redefine your taste buds. Baked continuously throughout the day from the purest ingredients, with no additives or preservatives, the pastries and pies served up at this little gem of a shop have made Athens a prime destination of Danforth-goers seeking a light meal or an exquisite dessert. A nice bonus: their coffees, both regular and specialty, are as fresh and full-flavoured as you'll find anywhere.

When you're not in GreekTown, you can enjoy Athens' second location, conveniently located on Victoria Park just south of Sheppard, with ample free parking on site.

Everything at Athens is worth trying, but if you're a dessert lover who'se been disappointed occasionally — haven't we all? — the bougatsa will really send you over the top.

Reminiscent of the French mille feuilles, or the English custard slice, Athens' rendition of bougatsa is as close to perfection as a dessert gets: ultracrisp, delicate crust outside, light, mildly sweet vanilla custard inside. And here's the best part: even with a liberal sprinkling of icing sugar and cinnamon, at no time does it taste too sweet, and the cloying aftertaste so common with commercial desserts is noticeably absent.

This second-generation family business (owner George Tsioutsioulas, father Evangelos and their dedicated staff) has probably rolled enough pastry dough to stretch from here to Greece, so the name "Athens" is perfectly apt. The fact that it's rolled lovingly, with constant attention to quality, is confirmed by your first bite.

Sun Valley more than brand names

If you value quality, hate spending hours schelpping through giant faceless supermarkets, and need more than the corner grocery store can offer, Sun Valley Fine Foods is tailor-made for you.

Larger than the typical neighbourhood European food store, yet small enough to navigate your way through quickly, Sun Valley is boutique food shopping at its very finest. Just about every sought-after brand name is here, from gourmet grocery items to breads, cakes and pastries. The produce is spectacular; the meat, fish and poultry are perfection itself.

But Sun Valley is more than just brand names and quality. It's about finding exactly what you need for your family and special occasion dining with efficient, friendly personal service.

It's these attributes which keep customers coming back — not only the locals, but shoppers from North York, Thornhill, and even Richmond Hill, often armed with the temperature-controlled bags that have become standard equipment among shoppers willing to go the extra mile for the very best.

People come from outside GreekTown to shop Sun Valley "for the same reasons they patronize the restaurants," says partner Spiro Aravantinos: "quality, freshness, flavour, and value."

Ah yes, value. What Aravantinos doesn't mention — but what's obvious from a quick tour of Sun Valley — is that they've resisted "snob appeal". In true GreekTown spirit, they've kept their prices affordable even as their reputation has continued to grow.

The bottom line is that under this one roof you'll find exactly what you want in less time — yet at a more leisurely pace — than in the "big box" supermarkets. And, if you're a husband who'se been "commissioned" to bring home the groceries, your chances of getting a glowing report card on arrival are better here than just about anywhere else.

The reason is simple: Sun Valley just doesn't sell anything that won't get the spousal seal of approval — no matter how hard that may be to come by in your household.

Greek geography plus plus

Check almost any real estate listing, and you'll find its list of features accompanied by the phrase plus plus. Dramatic entranceway plus plus; gleaming hardwood floors plus plus; state-of-the-art kitchen plus plus.

In GreekTown, the kitchens are definitely state of the art, and their culinary output art plus plus. The restauranteurs who preside over these kitchens are justifiably proud of their art.

But GreekTown is so much more than Greek–Town. So when the Taste Of The Danforth bids you to "come taste the world", they're not kidding. And implicit in this invitation is the opportunity to experience the warmth of an area that has historically embraced other cultures not only as clients, but also as entrepreneurs.

Take Saul Korman for instance. Not many Jewish boys can say they're from Rouyn-Noranda, Québec, but Saul can. The gold mines' loss is our gain, as are Korman's many nicknames. Where does "SuperGreek" stash his Kryptonite? In GreekTown, of course.

The businesses featured in this section, which represent but a sampling of those in GreekTown, are owned not just by Greeks, but by people from all over the world.

In addition to geographic origin, of course, ethnicity, culture, and environment all contribute to who we are. Within my own immediate family — through birth, marriage, adoption, and osmosis — these influences include Canadian, Polish, Italian, American, French Canadian, French, Israeli, Native Indian, East Indian, and Dominican. And I've spent enough time in GreekTown to fancy myself an honourary Greek.

Most other neighbourhoods give GreekTown its due. Those that don't — the GreekTown wannabees — will tell you that the Taste Of The Danforth could have happened anywhere.

That's not the point. The point is, it happened in GreekTown. It happened in GreekTown not only because of the energetic forward thinkers who conceived it, but also because of the fertile soil in which they planted their seed. It happened in GreekTown because the welcoming spirit of the dozen blocks from Broadview to Jones is precisely the kind of environment that allows such an undertaking to flourish.

It's a big world we live in. Whether you're 5 or 55, if you dropped everything right now and spent the rest of your days travelling this planet, you'd barely begin to cover it. Even if you confined your travels to a much smaller area – like Greece – you would experience a small part, at best, of its wonders.

You can't know the entire planet, but a visit to GreekTown will get you off to a running start.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Awakenings speaks to the soul

You almost feel guilty calling it a "store"; it certainly doesn't "feel" like a store. Perhaps that's because Awakenings, a bright addition to the increasingly trendy strip of the Danforth east of Pape, is less a store than the fruition of a personal and spiritual odyssey.

Owner Natasha Dern reveals that her father, who passed away almost a year ago, was the catalyst for awakening in her the idea of owning a bookstore — a bookstore filled with products to enrich the soul and spirit. "The idea came out of the blue," she says, "but somehow it all made sense to me". In fact, the store name is also a reflection of Dern's continued awakenings to the possibilities in her own life. She hopes that Awakenings will offer the same possibilities for others.

Prior to settling on a location, Dern viewed many retail spaces in a variety of locations, but none "felt" right until 744 Danforth, so she considers her location "bashert" as well as the undertaking itself.

A visit to Awakenings will put you in the right frame of mind to embrace your quest for serenity and self-fulfillment. Enter its portals, and you're welcomed by the soothing scent of incense and an abundance of positive vibrations. The environment is pristine but down to earth ... warm and welcoming.

Everything in the shop speaks to the soul. The book selection can broadly be described as "inspirational" and includes popular titles such as The Teachings Of Abraham (Esther & Jerry Hicks), Healing With The Angels (Doreen Virtue), and The Power of Now (Eckhart Tolle). A variety of titles deal with personal growth and healing through prayer, meditation, and personal exploration.

There's a great selection of meditation CDs; candles, incense, crystals, hand-made healing stone bracelets; richly-coloured cotton T-shirts with a Chakra motif for yoga; and a variety of gift items and greeting cards perfect for anyone who values the spiritual over the material.

This non-denominational shop is a gleaming new tile in the Danforth's growing ethno-cultural mosaic. It's a quiet oasis amid the bustle — an opportunity to awaken to the possibilities within you.

Sürga's fashions make stylish statement

The good news: you have a flair for fashion that resonates with your growing clientele. The bad news: you've outgrown your current cozy but confining premises in the Beaches.

That's exactly what Robert Purwa and Stephen Jones did. Partners in Sürga — Indonesian for "heaven" — Purwa and Jones have parlayed their fashion backgrounds (including a lengthy stint by Purwa at Holt Renfrew) into a mini fashion mecca.

In keeping with its celestial name, you'll find Sürga both bright and whimsical. ("Holt Renfrew style without Holt Renfrew prices"), winks Purwa. The focus is on handbags and accessories, but there's also an eye-catching selection of dresses and tops.

Looking for the perfect purse that has so far eluded you? Chances are it's here, with oodles of hats, sunglasses, and costume jewellery to match.

Mass merchandising is everything this shop is NOT; it's an eclectic mix of items hand-picked on buying excursions both near and far for women who march to their own fashion drummer.

Says Jones, "We let the department stores address an audience of thousands. We "speak" to our customers one to one and one by one."

A few examples: ultracool tattoo tops from L.A. (Sürga's one of only three shops in Toronto to carry them); jean jackets hand-painted by a local artist; and hand-made jewellery encrusted with freshwater pearls.

Always on the lookout for new and exciting designers, Purwa and Jones attend fashion shows religiously, both domestically and abroad. "We support local talent as well as big-name designers," says Purwa.

Thanks to their theatrical flair, the partners have received a growing number of commissions from the music, film and theatrical industries. "Every day is an adventure in fashion", says Jones. "We embrace it and celebrate it."

For a shop with lofty ambitions, Sürga's prices are enticingly low. "It's not how much you spend on an item", notes Jones. "It's what that item says about you."

Taste The 4th Sense heats up GreekTown

TASTE "The Fourth Sense", a division of The Salivation Corporation, has opened its doors at 375 Danforth Ave.

With a unique retail style and one of the largest selections of hot sauces in the country, it's sure to become a destination for foodies everywhere.

The most unique aspect of TASTE is that virtually every item sold in the store can be sampled on the premises. One of the store's highly trained and personable sales staff will be happy to recommend products and take your taste buds on a tour. No surprises when you get home!

TASTE also exclusively retails a unique line of oils, vinegars and salad zests from The Herbery. The Herbery products are the cornerstone of the store, and aren't available anywhere else in the city. These unique products are handcrafted in Orangeville, Ontario. They are all natural, chemical free, and made exclusively with cold pressed or expellerated oils.

Many of The Herbery products come in hand-painted bottles. These oils have never been subjected to heat and retain all of their inherent nutrition. They not only possess amazing flavour but are also very beneficial to general health and well-being. TASTE is also one of the few stores in North America to aggressively promote grapeseed oils. These heart-smart oils contain half the saturated fat of olive oil and are world-renowned for their high level of antioxidants.

The virtegars and salad zests are made exclusively with all-natural white wine or apple cider vinegar. Using real fruit and fresh herbs, the flavours are strong and the applications numerous.

Proudly featuring hand-picked Canadian and directly imported products, TASTE puts its reputation on the line each and every day. With row upon row of the finest, most flavourful products, many of them all-natural, organic, chemical-free and/or certified kosher, TASTE is a flavour haven where "Sampling is encouraged and tasting is believing."

Ampeli knows only one way: the right way

There's no substitute for freshness. In six short years, Ampeli has drawn the kind of rave reviews restaurants covet, and now belongs to that select group of restaurants that keep loyal clients like Saul Korman coming back for more.

George, the manager, attributes this success to a simple formula: use the freshest, highest-quality ingredients, lightly seasoned and prepared simply. Everything's cooked to order, meaning you have to wait a little longer for your meal to arrive; but the wait is more than worth it.

Meat and fish are always fresh, never frozen, and Ampeli has become renowned for both. You simply can't find better rack of lamb or Ontario lamb chops anywhere. The fresh fish is so popular customers usually specify, when making reservations, which type of fish they want. Red snapper, porgy, codfish, smelts, whiting — if it's just been caught, you'll find it on Ampeli's table the same day.

For George this means more legwork, combing the market for the freshest catch of the day. "This isn't an option," he notes. "It's an obligation to our customers."

Warm ciabatta bread accompanies every meal with a side of olive oil and balsamic vinegar. Fresh pasta is handmade on the premises, and all sauces are à la minute.

AMPELI

526 Danforth Ave. 416-465-4001

Ampeli's distinctive red brick exterior and huge patios, complete with bright flowers, are a welcome sight for anyone seeking Greek and Mediterranean cuisine as it's meant to taste.

> "... Only at Ampeli did we meet moist, tender, roast Ontario lamb. Ditto the moussaka experience .... at Ampeli the moussaka was marvellously fragrant, full of rich flavours. Roasted mashed eggplant dip is zinged with fresh mint, and marinated octopus is tender with a lovely vinegar bite. Meaty little quails have been marinated for tenderness and are cooked just so, and the grilled fresh porgy is a paragon of Piscean virtue, with especially crisp skin."

From "Bravo" to "Bravissimo" in one short year

Sleek, sexy, and resplendent behind its slate gray facade, Trapezzi's Italian culinary flair and glitz has been a whirlwind success on the Danforth.

Trapezzi — Greek for "table," as in the familial dining table — lives up to its moniker with grace and panache. The interior features a long, lean, granite bar flanked by plush bench seating seductively swathed in jaguar orchid velour. In a typically Italian juxtaposition of sumptuousness and starkness, honey-brown birch flooring and amber parquetted ceiling tiles cozy up to textured concrete walls.

The cosmopolitan environment is chic but friendly, the cuisine a triumph of substance and style that in one short year has garnered a regular clientele for both everyday and special occasion dining.

Under the direction of chef David Bizeau, the upscale but reasonably-priced menu continues to evolve and delight. For starters, try the bruschetta with whipped goat cheese — a crisp, refreshing new take on an old favourite. House specials include the Fettuccine with dried cranberries, toasted walnuts, leeks, and gorgonzola cream; the Mushroom Risotto, resplendent with shitake, oyster, and portobello mushrooms in porcini broth, asiago and truffle oil; and the new Seared Breast of Muscovy Duck, served with ravioli of duck confit, wild mushroom, baby spinach, and mascarpone in baby duck jus.

Fresh daily seafood specials are de rigueur on the Danforth, and Trapezzi's Chilean Sea Bass, among others, is first-rate.

Everything's fresh, made to order, and with ample flair and flavour to satisfy even the most demanding connoisseur.

Hat maker a throwback to bygone era

His hats adorn the heads of celebrities, but you won't find Louis Alexakos in any spotlight. You won't meet him at trendy parties, nor will you see his name in the fashion section on a regular basis.

Hat Depot
Custom Made Hats
704 Danforth (E. of Pape)
416.406.1222

Where you will find him is sitting quietly at his venerable Singer sewing machine in his shop at 704 Danforth, making one by one, with his own hands, the hats that have become synonymous with quality among those who insist on old-school perfection in their headwear.

And the everyday folk like you and me who seek him out for this kind of perfection — at unfathomably low prices — rate equally in his book with the likes of Naomi Campbell, the Backstreet Boys, Big It Up and David Justice, all of whom are living testimonials to his milliner's art. "I make hats with the same care, no matter who is going to wear them", he says. "They tell me the hats are going to be worn on this show or that show, but I don't have time to watch TV. I'm too busy making hats."

Alexakos is part of a dying breed, a throwback to the glory days of Spadina when our parents and grandparents made every stitch count. His stubborn refusal to go mass-market stems from a simple, defining principle: "I love to make hats. This is what I do."

In addition to making a selection of classic styles that are always in demand, such as the Greek Fisherman's hat he sports at left, Alexakos will custom-make a hat to your specifications. Bring him an idea — or better yet, a picture or sketch of what you want — and before you can say "Louis Alexakos", your vision will become reality.

When you purchase a hat bearing the Hat Depot label, it goes without saying that you're getting a garment made of the finest quality materials, fashioned with old world craftsmanship. You can see it in the stitching, in the lining, and in the embroidery.

But really, you're getting more than a hat: you're getting a little piece of history, a rich reminder of a bygone era.

If the hat fits, wear it.

After disengagement, more challenges

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

With its planned withdrawal from Gaza and the northern West Bank virtually a fait accompli, Israel is bracing for the morning after. Israeli decision-makers expect challenges on several fronts: international, Palestinian and domestic.

The first challenge could be a call for a new international conference to kickstart the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. France first suggested the idea six months ago, and it was later picked up by Russia and the United States.

Israel remains adamantly opposed. Israeli officials argue that before weighty peace issues can be discussed, the Palestinians must show they can run their affairs in the Gaza Strip and prevent terrorism. The Israelis assert that a premature peace parley could do more harm than good by signalling to the Palestinians that the process can move forward even if they don't carry out their promised security, economic and political reforms or stop attacks against Israel.

Western diplomats, however, fear the process could bog down unless strong international pressure is exerted on both sides. An international conference, they say, would be part of that effort.

Yesha Council leader Zviki Bar Hai was held back by Border Police last week as he tried to breach their ranks near Ofakim in the Negev. Thousands of disengagement opponents were in the area to try to outflank security forces who were trying to prevent Israelis from marching into Gaza, which has been declared a restricted military zone ahead of the upcoming disengagement. Some protesters managed to evade police even as some were arrested near the Kissufim crossing. The army says Israelis trying to enter Gaza are endangering soldiers and themselves. [Israel photo]

CJC condemns death curse against Sharon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress has condemned an ancient death curse against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon issued by 20 Israeli far-right activists, including rabbis, opposed to Israel's forthcoming withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

Late last month, the activists held a ceremony near Safed in which they released their pulsa denura ("lashes of fire" in Aramaic).

'It is utterly unacceptable'

One of the participants, Rabbi Yosef Dayan, issued the same curse against former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin several months before Rabin's assassination in November 1995.

"The position taken by these individuals is so corrosive to the values of Judaism that it must be roundly condemned by religious leaders and all responsible elements within our community," Congress said in a statement.

It was signed by CJC's national president Ed Morgan and Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of Congress' religious affairs committee.

In a plea to religious and lay leaders, they added: "We urge you to take opportunity with your congregations and others… to appropriately condemn any and all actions that encourage lawlessness and violence in this way.

"It is utterly unacceptable for the political leadership of the state and, indeed, for the Jewish nation itself, to be threatened by extremism in the name of Judaism."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Segal Named to Senate

OTTAWA — Longtime Conservative strategist Hugh Segal was among five new appointments to Canada's Senate announced last week by Prime Minister Paul Martin. Segal, a graduate of Montreal's Talmud Torah school system, served as principal secretary to former Ontario premier Bill Davis and as chief of staff to former prime minister Brian Mulroney. He also made aborted runs for the Tory leadership in 1993 and 1998. Segal will become Canada's fifth Jewish senator.

Mayor to Visit Israel

VANCOUVER — In one of his last acts in office, Vancouver Mayor Larry Campbell will visit Israel this month. Campbell will tour Haifa, at the invitation of its mayor, as well as Kiryat Shmona. Campbell, the inspiration for the TV show Da Vinci's Inquest, was also slated to attend a gay pride parade in Jerusalem, but the event was cancelled due to security concerns.

Burial Plots

REGINA — Regina's Jewish community has developed a new cemetery where non-Jews can be buried beside their Jewish partners. The new space incorporates two cemeteries, allowing Jewish and non-Jewish people to be buried side by side with a chain link fence separating the plots. A spokesperson for the Jewish Burial Society said the innovation recognizes the modern reality of intermarriage, the CBC reported.

Argentine AMIA Judge Impeached

BUENOS AIRES — An Argentine judge has been impeached because of "serious irregularities" in his handling of the investigation of a bombing at a Jewish centre.

A special panel said last week that Juan Jose Galeano committed a number of irregularities in the case of the 1994 bombing of the AMIA centre, including paying $400,000 (US) to a witness to change his testimony, burning evidence and ordering illegal bugging operations.

The impeachment strips Galeano of immunity from prosecution, and he could face criminal charges. He denies wrongdoing.

The bombing of the AMIA social service centre in downtown Buenos Aires in July 1994 killed 85 people and injured hundreds. The case remains unsolved.

WORLD

Stem Cell Support

WASHINGTON — Jewish groups have welcomed the U.S. Senate majority leader's statement that he supports a bill to expand embryonic stem-cell research. Bill Frist's comment brightened prospects for the bill, which President George W. Bush opposes. The legislation, backed by a wide array of American Jewish groups, including Hadassah and the Orthodox Union, passed the U.S. House of Representatives in May. A Senate vote is not expected until next month, but Bush says he'll veto the bill.

Favourable Attitudes

WASHINGTON — More Americans admire Jews than Roman Catholics, Muslims, evangelicals or atheists, a poll showed. Jews received a 77 per cent favourable rating in a survey published recently by the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life that assessed attitudes toward Muslims. Catholics scored 73 per cent, Protestant evangelicals and Muslims each got 57 per cent and atheists earned 35 per cent. Pew described the figures as stable in recent years.

Nuclear sale

LONDON — Britain sold Israel material in the 1950s that can be used in nuclear production, the BBC reported. The 1958 sale was for 20 tons of heavy water, which is used to make plutonium. The deal was camouflaged as a non-nuclear transaction between Norway and Israel. It is widely believed that Israel possesses nuclear weapons, but the government won't comment on the matter.

Population Stabilizes

LONDON — The decline in the birthrate of British Jews has stopped. According to the annual survey by the Board of Deputies, a community umbrella group, the same number of births, 2,665, were recorded in 2002 and 2003, the latest year for which figures are available. Births have dropped nine per cent since 1993, but the downward trend appears to have ended, the report noted.

Teacher in 'Hot' Water

BOSTON — A journalism instructor at Boston University was fired for calling a student a "true Sabra," or native Israeli, who is "incredibly hot." Writing on his personal Web log, Michael Gee, a former Boston Herald sportswriter, described a student as "so incredibly hot" that "it was all I could do to remember the other five students," Boston magazine reported. Gee did not identify the student, but Boston named her as Natalie Zfat, a Brooklyn native from the University of Central Florida taking summer courses at BU. Zfat, 19, quit the course, telling the magazine, "You're entitled to feel safe and comfortable knowing that your professor is a professional, not a pervert."

Former BJE head was in 'a league beyond the ordinary'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Irwin (Yitzchak) Witty, former executive director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, a man whose interests and talents ranged from theology to education to music to public speaking, died recently after a long illness. He was 73. In line with his dedication to religious Zionist ideals, he was buried in Israel.

Obituary

Rabbi Witty was born in New York, and received his smichah from Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS) at Yeshiva University.

After serving as a pulpit rabbi in Philadelphia and then as a pulpit rabbi and school principal in Winnipeg, he joined the Toronto BJE in 1969 as its executive director, a post he held until his retirement in 1997.

He had a firm belief that every Jewish child, regardless of financial situation or ability, has a right to a Jewish education. He fought for subsidies from United Jewish Appeal for needy students, and, even after his retirement, he urged governments to fund Jewish day schools.

Together with the late Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg, and Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, he founded She'arim Hebrew Day School (now Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School), one of the few day schools serving Jewish children with learning disabilities.

He also "transformed the BJE into the community's predominant educational consulting service for Jewish educators," UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said in a statement.

After his retirement, he worked for a short time in Milwaukee, then returned to Toronto, where in 2002 he became executive director of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library.

He also gave a daf yomi class in Yiddish, as well as sermons and classes in Torah, and he led services on the High Holy Days.

Rabbi Irwin (Yitzchak) Witty

"A great soul has left us and we are all deeply sorrowed by this passing," said BJE chair Baila Lubek.

The tremendous respect and affection for Rabbi Witty was demonstrated at a memorial service held for him at Clanton Park Synagogue that was attended by hundreds of people from all sectors of the Jewish community.

Rabbi Yehoshua Weber, spiritual leader of Clanton Park, called Rabbi Witty "a scholar with a burning intellect and incredible people and pedagogic skills."

Rabbi Witty, an Orthodox rabbi, dealt with many people who were not observant, yet "he didn't either break bridges or burn them," Rabbi Weber said.

Clanton Park's rabbi emeritus, Yitzchak Kerzner, praised Rabbi Witty's "versatility, intellect, vision, commitment, and dedication – [he was in] a league beyond the ordinary."

He was a "talented speaker and electrifying teacher who enthralled his listeners," and his sense of humour, which many people noted, "made his speeches, even the most profound, easy to listen to," Rabbi Kerzner said.

The most moving parts of the service came from the contributions of Rabbi Witty's family. Three grandsons said Tehillim (Psalms), in his memory, and one talked about learning with him and how he would make his grandchildren their favourite breakfast, take them to the zoo, and make up stories with them – with "no adults allowed."

His oldest son, Rabbi Noach Witty, described his father as "an unabashed religious Zionist, even when it was unfashionable in the Orthodox community to be Mizrachi."

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "It was impossible to follow him on stage because he had a booming presence. He would tell a joke, and when he left the stage people were still laughing."

Rabbi Witty is survived by his wife, Shulamith, sons Rabbi Noach Witty and Rabbi Avraham Aryeh Witty, daughters Leah Stromer and Judy Lustig, and 22 grandchildren.

From the editor's desk

Was he motivated simply by hatred of Arabs, or by politics? Did he believe his murderous rampage would halt or even suspend the disengagement process? Did he hope to evoke an emotional conflagration among the Arabs of Israel? Did he expect to die in the line of his demented "duty?"

We will never know. For IDF soldier Pte. Eden Natan Zaada was set upon last Thursday by the outraged mob of some of his intended victims, and he was killed as violently as he killed the four passengers on a bus in Shfaram, an Arab village in the Galilee.

In the immediate aftermath of the murders, the country held its breath for fear that the violent anger at the scene of the shootings would spill over into the streets in Arab communities throughout the country and the territories.

But after the initial mob rage was spent, calm prevailed.

In part, order was restored because of the swift response by police and security forces. The national chief of police, personally took charge of the tense, bloodied murder site and asserted fair but firm authority.

In equal part, however, peace was restored to the community by the quick response of Israel's military and political leadership. As well as speaking directly and sincerely to the people and leaders of Shfaram to convey personal and collective condolences, they also spoke directly to the people of Israel, unequivocally denouncing the murders and the murderer.

The IDF Chief of Staff, Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz, and the minister of defence immediately expressed their condolences to the families of the victims and their wishes for a quick recovery to those who were wounded. Halutz also ordered an investigation into the circumstances surrounding and leading up to the possession of an IDF weapon by the soldier, who had gone AWOL and was of a problematic background.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon condemned the atrocity in the harshest of terms, without equivocation or nuance.

"This was a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist who sought to attack innocent Israeli citizens. This terrorist event was a deliberate attempt to harm the fabric of relations among all Israeli citizens.

"Terrorism by civilians against civilians is the most dangerous thing affecting the future of the State of Israel and its stability as a democracy. On my behalf and that of the government, I send condolences to the families of those who were murdered and my best wishes for a quick recovery to those who were wounded. The entire State of Israel, regardless of race, religion or sex, strongly condemns this act of terrorism. The government is determined to protect the lives of Israel's citizens, from all ethnic communities and sectors. I have instructed the security services to accord the highest priority to investigating this terrorist attack. At this difficult hour for the State of Israel, I call on all public leaders in Israel – Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Druze – to work together in an effort to maintain the internal fabric of relations and to act responsibly and with restraint, and to allow the legal authorities to finish their investigation of this awful terrorist attack."

The statement was a powerful expression of the total revulsion felt by the vast majority of Israeli society at the shootings and an equally powerful reiteration of the values underpinning that society.

Sharon minced no words. He described the shootings precisely as they were, namely, a "reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist." After his public statement, Sharon telephoned Shfaram Mayor Ersan Yassin to again convey his sorrow over the terrorist attack.

"Jews and Arabs will always live in the State of Israel together… even in the wake of such horrific events, we will succeed in maintaining quiet together," Sharon said.

Jewish leaders around the world echoed the unwavering denunciation by the Israeli leaders.

Marc Gold, National Chair of the Canada-Israel Committee: "The attack on innocents – regardless of race, religion or ethnicity – is a very serious and intolerable breach of Israeli democracy. We call on all political and religious leadership to signal – in word and deed – their commitment to the principles of democracy and civil society."

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive director:"Our entire Jewish community is outraged by this unconscionable act."

The Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America: "There is no justification for this reprehensible act which is clearly at odds with fundamental Jewish teachings. Acts of violence in the name of Zionism and/or Judaism are degradations of these noble values and must be eradicated from the midst of the Jewish People."

And so on. Every major Jewish organization in the Diaspora condemned the terror attack last Thursday.

As they should have.

CIJA looking ahead to World Peace Forum

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A couple of years ago, when the blueprint for the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) was being laid out, the architects of the agency determined that community organizations should move beyond simply reacting to crises.

They determined that it is important for the Jewish community's resources to mobilize to respond more effectively to ongoing developments but that the community should also anticipate upcoming issues.

With almost a year to go before the World Peace Forum convenes in Vancouver, CIJA affiliates on the West Coast are already developing strategies to address the possible detrimental affects of the international meeting on Canadian Jews.

The World Peace Forum, said CIJA CEO Hershell Ezrin, is a direct spinoff of Durban, the one-word shorthand for what is widely regarded in the Jewish community as an anti-Semitic hate fest. Already 45 per cent of the program suggested by NGOs for Vancouver focus on the Israeli/Palestinian conflict, he said.

Personnel from the Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) are working with the local federation to develop strategies and marshal resources to best respond to the event.

Ezrin pointed to that co-ordinated effort as an example of how CIJA, which was established to streamline, improve and fund Jewish advocacy organizations, can best "leverage" community resources for maximum impact.

"Leverage" is a word that comes up frequently in a conversation with the well-connected Ezrin, who was chief of staff to the former Ontario premier David Peterson. One of the mandates of the organization is to employ community resources more effectively and to be able to demonstrate in an empirical manner that its efforts are bearing fruit.

Despite its growing pains, CIJA has succeeded in streamlining processes, eliminating redundant back- office operations and employing community resources more efficiently, Ezrin asserts.

Whether that sort of "leverage" has been successful will, no doubt, be one of the factors to be examined in a review of CIJA being conducted by UIA Federations Canada, the national organization under whose umbrella CIJA operates. CIJA receives community funds through UIA and, in turns, allocates them to three recipients, Congress, the CIC and National Jewish Campus Life, and monitors how the funds are spent.

When CIJA was conceived, there was widespread concern that traditional community advocacy didn't seem to be responding effectively to challenges.

A who's who of the Jewish business establishment put their weight behind the new advocacy organization and CIJA was born. CIC was reorganized and a national campus organization was established to respond to particularly vicious anti-Israel agitation at Canadian universities. Congress, which had qualms about coming under the CIJA umbrella, also saw its internal structure modified.

Ezrin believes the reorganization has worked. Costs across the board have been reduced, with some services such as information technology, accounting and payroll consolidated. In addition, the organizations communicate better among themselves. By reducing costs, more money is left over for actual program delivery, he said.

CIJA and its affiliated organizations operate on an annual budget of $10 million, almost double the amount available before CIJA's creations – a sum that no doubt, staffers in both organizations wish had been available to them pre-CIJA.

Ezrin acknowledged that Congress has seen its overall budget reduced substantially, but he said the organization's program budget has gone up. Program money is pooled and each agency must compete for it by demonstrating its use best advances the core goals of community advocacy – among them, improving Canadians' attitudes to Israel, Ezrin said.

Ezrin rejected suggestions that CIJA has added a layer of bureaucracy to Jewish communal organization and reduced the funds available to advocacy groups. CIJA, he said, has been "additive" and thanks to CIJA, more funds are flowing from donors into community coffers.

Part of CIJA's strategy is to foster grassroots political action committees to advocate for Israel in local communities, by emphasizing the "shared values" that bind Israel with Canada.

Ezrin said CIJA had a role in supporting the creation of Fighting Anti-Semitism Together, a project spearheaded by Bank of Montreal CEO Tony Comper and his wife, Elizabeth. The organization attracted the participation of 21 senior business executives from Canadian blue-chip corporations.

Working in conjunction with Congress, the Compers plan to launch an educational project this fall targeted at public schools.

Ezrin said CIJA played a role in other major events of the past year, including Prime Minister Paul Martin's reference to seeking justice for Jewish refugees from Arab lands, a shift in Canada's voting pattern at the United Nations away from automatically siding with critics of Israel and the statement by Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew that Canada and Israel see eye to eye on Hezbollah.

Ezrin acknowledges Canada's UN voting pattern has not changed as much as he'd like, but "we consider it a first step."

Ezrin claims polling commissioned by CIJA proves attitudes of Canadians are changing toward a more positive perception of Israel, but he would not release specific findings.

He said the Jewish community is improving relations with other groups, such as the Chinese, Sikh and First Nations communities.

Still, he said, the Jewish community faces many challenges, on campuses, in labour movements and from demographic shifts that sees the country's Muslim population growing, making opposition to Israel more palatable to politicians.

"No doubt there are a lot of concerns, but the people who supported CIJA realized early on that we always faced a negative numbers game over the centuries and we have to work in as effective and efficient way as possible. We have to work smart."

CIJA, he continued, "is all about collaboration. We're a small community in a very large country geographically. We're a small percentage of the population. We have to collaborate. CIJA gets people to sit down and work together."

Israeli, Palestinian debate merits of disengagement

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The practicality of Israel's imminent withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the northern West Bank was the subject of a lively debate between two academics – one Israeli, the other Palestinian – last week in Toronto.

Gabriel Ben-Dor, a Haifa University professor of political science and an architect of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral disengagement plan, presented an optimistic view of its value.

Khalil Shikaki, director of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Security Research in Ramallah, predicted that Israel and the Palestinian Authority will fail to take advantage of the pullout and that it will probably backfire.

Ben-Dor and Shikaki were in the city at the invitation of the Canada-Israel Committee and also visited Montreal and Ottawa.

Ben-Dor, an expert in Israeli foreign and national security policy, and the author of more than 10 books on these and other topics, described unilateral withdrawal as a non-political, pragmatic, flexible idea free of ideology.

Its broad purpose, he explained, is to relieve Israel of the burden of maintaining an occupation over one million Palestinian Arabs, to break the current political deadlock and to give Palestinians hope about the future.

In a more narrow sense, the relinquishment of these territories is manifestly in Israel's military and demographic interests, Ben-Dor said.

Israel will be easier to defend and more Jewish."Israel will be smaller but more secure, and will be better off, even if the Palestinians do not reciprocate."

He added, "We're doing the right thing at the right time."

If disengagement succeeds, Israel and the Palestinians can proceed to implement the 2003 internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, which envisions a two-state solution.

Though Ben-Dor acknowledged that Sharon and some of his associates covet the West Bank, he disagreed with the claim that disengagement is essentially a conspiracy by Israel to strengthen its grip on the bulk of the West Bank.

Israel's readiness to jettison four isolated settlements in the West Bank is an important precedent, he said.

By agreeing to dismantle 21 settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank, Sharon has undergone a huge transformation in his thinking and thereby alienated many of his former supporters, Ben-Dor observed.

Sharon recognizes that hanging on to territory with a hostile and resentful Palestinian population is untenable and harmful to Israel's status as a Jewish state, he added.

Yet Sharon is basically confused. "He doesn't know what to do next."

If peace and stability prevail in Gaza after Israel's pullout, Sharon will proceed to "phase two" of his unilateral plan, said Ben-Dor, who did not elaborate on what that would entail.

But if Palestinian militias attack Israel in the wake of its withdrawal, Sharon will freeze the situation, he said.

Describing Gaza as "a miserable place," Ben-Dor said its economy must be radically overhauled so that it can support its inhabitants.

But this transformation cannot occur unless the Palestinian Authority shows real leadership and imposes order, he added.

At the end of the day, there is room for optimism, he said, because PA Presidents Mahmoud Abbas is a decent man who does not obsess about past injustices, though he has mentioned the right of return in his speeches.

As well, in terms of leadership, Abbas represents an improvement over his late predecessor, Yasser Arafat, Ben Dor said.

He added that another reason for optimism is that most Israelis have given up on the notion of keeping territories captured in the 1967 Six Day War at any cost.

Shikaki, a political science professor at An-Najah University in Nablus, said disengagement can be advantageous for Palestinian society under certain conditions.

It gives the Palestinians an opportunity to end their "violent relationship" with Israel and offers hope that the peace process can be restarted, he said.

Bracing ourselves, embracing others

If a month can be said to be sad, then this month, Av, is the saddest of all months. In particular, the ninth day of the month, Tisha b'Av, has been a lightning rod of sorts for national Jewish disaster for more than two millennia. And we have marked and commemorated that day with tears, prayer and fasting.

As the images of the Israeli disengagement from Gaza and four northern West Bank communities slated to begin in a few days beam around the world, some Jews will contend that these events too will be added to the roster of Tisha b'Av calamities.

We will see Israeli soldiers forcibly evicting Jews from their homes and many, if not all, of those homes being turned into rubble. We will see Palestinians celebrating, planting their own flags in the sand. And, of course, we will see masked terrorists brandishing their weapons in obscene, triumphalist bravado. "The disengagement has been won through the blood of our martyrs," they will shout. "This is a great victory against the Jews," they will boast to the receptive news agencies of the world.

The images will be very hard indeed for us to witness. There is no avoiding it. We will have to brace ourselves for the pain and the emotional aftershock they will evoke.

But we will also have to understand that the terrorists' shouts will be but hollow whooping and their boasting a hysteria of mass, self-delusional ecstasy. As will become clear over time, disengagement is less about the Palestinians than it is about the Israelis. As Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has correctly observed, the State of Israel must not, as a matter of principle, rule over the millions of Palestinian Arabs. Moreover, as a matter of practice, it cannot. International law will not allow it. Nor will Jewish governance be able to absorb it. Sharon has acted boldly and decisively to ensure and to safeguard the Jewishness of the future Jewish state. When the shock and the pain abate, as they surely will, that fact and that future will be incontrovertible. Disengagement is vital for the sake of the soul and character of the Jewish state.

As difficult as the images will be, withdrawal from Gaza is not to be counted among the theological disasters of our history. Let no lamentations be said for disengagement.

From the beginnings of time, the Jewish People has always risen from the low benches of our sadness; we have always sung hymns of praise after the doleful melodies of our tearful keening. So, too, must we today. We must embrace each other and bridge the internal divides in renewed, restrengthened resolve.

• Daylight time (summer time) was instituted in Israel for the first time since pre-state days and a brief time after the Yom Kippur War. Energy conservationists and nature-loving Israelis welcomed the extra daylight at the end of the day, but the Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Shlomo Goren, charged it would cause problems with morning prayer times and lead to desecration of Shabbat.

• Len Marcus, director of Canada's United Israel Appeal effort in Jerusalem, demanded more Canadian input into how UIA money is used in Israel and less bureaucratic interference with UIA programs.

Young offender's apology

I represent one of the young persons who was recently convicted with respect to the defacement of property at a Jewish school, synagogue and cemetery in March of last year.

Prior to his arrest, he wrote the attached apology. The letter was given to the court during his sentencing. At the time, I offered to give a copy of it to your newspaper as you may wish to publish part of it. The only alteration I have made is to block out his name, so as not to identify him.

Editor's note: The following letter, addressed to a rabbi, has been published in the form in which we received it.

Dear Raby:

This letter is cunserning the damage that was dune to your cinagoge. I wanted to apologize because I was one of the people who damaged it. At the time I didn't think that this would hurt people in the way that it did. I didnt know the history behind your peoples sufering and when I lernd of what I had really done I turned myself in and cunfesed because I did not intend to hurt anybody. The intent was to do something that would be on the NEWS. So me and two of my friends copped something that was already on the NEWS. We had no idea what we were really doing and I hate myself for what I did but I just wanted you and your people to know that I dont hate the Jewish community and the crime that we committed was not out of hate. Infact I respect you and your people for going threw what you went threw and still keep fighting against hate. I just wanted you to know I am trully sorry for what I did and from now on Im fighting against hate instead of promoting hate.
Sincerely

ARZA Canada on the disengagement

In recent weeks, reports have been coming out of Israel indicating that some religious leaders are advocating more or less open revolt against the government of the State of Israel in the matter of the planned disengagement from the Gaza strip. Pronouncements have been coming out couched in language reminiscent of the inflammatory rhetoric preceding the tragic assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995. Whatever position one takes on the advisability of the disengagement, it has been decided on by the democratically elected government of Israel, which feels that it is acting in the best interests of the state. Disagreements should be expressed at the ballot box, and not through insurrection. The rabbis write that the Temple was destroyed because of sinat chinam (senseless hatred). We call upon the citizens of Israel not to allow their miraculously revived homeland to succumb to this ancient scourge and remind them of the rabbinic dictum dina d'malchuta dina (the law of the land is the law).

Jewish organizations and Darfur

In listing Jewish organizations that have worked for the Darfur victims of genocide, we were remiss in not mentioning Avrum Rosensweig and Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee's great leadership in coalescing Jewish groups ("Blacks in Darfur experiencing 'African Auschwitz,'" July 21). Avrum helped Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan navigate and stimulate the response of the Jewish community. As well, the March of the Living did some significant initiatives.

Scribe replies to article about her

There were a couple of incorrect points made in the story about me ("Female scribe writes Torah for Seattle synagogue," CJN, July 7).

The article said, "The rabbi (who wishes to remain anonymous) said it 'might be possible' for him to teach her Torah writing if they met and if they hit it off. He also insisted that she live an observant life." I'm concerned that the "hit it off" stipulation might sound a bit like a casting couch. If anyone got the impression that our relationship went beyond that of teacher-student, it is simply untrue. Also, I was already a committed mitzvah-observant Jew before he and I ever had contact, and I did not become one in order to learn sofrut.

The article went on to say: "But I've finished Genesis and I'm part way through Exodus." I have only written the last few chapters of Genesis, the very beginning of Exodus and some of Deuteronomy. I am concerned that if my clients who commissioned the sefer Torah from me were to believe that I had completed more work than I have, it would negatively and unnecessarily complicate our business relationship.

The article also said: "Barclay says she knows of no other woman who has written a sefer Torah." However, I did mention to your reporter that there is one woman who may have done so and I am currently researching her for my upcoming book.

Reflections on the 120th anniversary of the death of Sir Moses Montefiore

By PAUL SHAVIV

Few Jewish "heroes" of the last 200 years can equal the combination of longevity and good deeds displayed by the British Jewish philanthropist and activist Sir Moses Montefiore, who died well into his 101st year on July 28, 1885.

In his day, the name Moses Montefiore carried the same aura in the Jewish world as did the names Rothschild or Herzl in theirs. His six decades of ceaseless activity were, in their own way, pioneering efforts in Jewish world affairs.

Moses Montefiore was born in 1784. His wife, Judith (1784-1862), was a daughter of Levi Barent Cohen, a Dutch merchant who arrived in England in the late 18th century and who perspicaciously married off his children to Rothschilds, Goldsmids and Mocattas.

For a century and a half, almost everyone who was anyone in Anglo-Jewry, Sephardi or Ashkenazi, was a descendant of Levi Barent Cohen. Under the patronage of Victorian and Edwardian royalty, they were created knights of the shire and peers of the realm. They were "the Jewish great and the Jewish good" of English society and of Jewish charities and community organizations alike. Sir Moses, while not their biological patriarch (he and Judith had no children), was the symbolic head of the family, from whose legacy they derived a considerable sense of public and Jewish noblesse oblige.

At the age of 40, he retired from the City of London, where he worked closely as a broker with his brother-in-law, Nathan Mayer Rothschild. In his business life, he was an innovator, investing in the supply of gas for street lighting piped to European cities, through the Imperial Continental Gas Association. He was among the founding consortium of the Alliance Life Assurance Company, and a director of the Provincial Bank of Ireland. Highly regarded in the city, he was elected as sheriff of London in 1836, in which capacity he was knighted by Queen Victoria in 1837.

From the time of his retirement until the day of his death, Montefiore devoted himself to philanthropy and to alleviating the distress of Jews all over the world. He also presided over the Jewish community in England for decades.

The details of his journeys overseas are relatively well-known – to the sultan of Turkey in 1840 to defend the Jews of Damascus against a blood libel; to Rome in 1858 to try to free the Jewish youth Edgar Mortara, kidnapped and baptized by his Catholic nurse; to Russia in 1846 and 1872; to Morocco in 1864 and to Romania in 1867. In every case, he went armed with the full panoply of British Victorian diplomacy. While history debates the practical efficacy of these trips, they were indisputably the forerunners of Jewish representation across borders to advocate for the welfare of Jewish communities in distress. These missions, more than anything, made Montefiore a folk hero of nearly mythological proportions in the depressed Jewries of eastern Europe, North Africa and the Levant.

We know tantalizingly little about his public and political life in general Victorian society, although there are indications of his civic and societal standing: Montefiore is mentioned in Charles Dickens' diaries and in the personal papers of George Eliot, and he is even mentioned in James Joyce's Ulysses.

We know he had contacts with non-conformists and social reformers in Victorian England. He was active in public initiatives aimed at alleviating the persecution of minorities in the Middle East and elsewhere, and he worked closely with organizations that campaigned for the abolition of slavery. A government loan raised by the Rothschilds and Montefiore in 1835 enabled the British government to compensate plantation owners and thus abolish slavery in the Empire.

His birthdays, his activities and certainly his passing drew considerable comment in the British press of the time.

But it was the Holy Land that was dearest to his heart. Accompanied on several of the trips by Judith, despite her delicate health, he made his way by carriage and ship to the Land of Israel no less than seven times – in 1827, 1838, 1849, 1855, 1857, 1866 and 1875. He was 91 years of age when he made his last trip. There he dispensed liberal philanthropy to many supplicants, but always sought to promote industry, education and health.

Montefiore's indelible mark on the Jerusalem landscape is, of course, the windmill and adjacent cottages and almshouses opposite the Old City, built by him as the executor of a fund left by the American Jewish pioneer Judah Touro. The project, bearing some of the hallmarks of 19th-century artisanal revival, aimed to promote productive enterprise in the Yishuv. The builders were brought over from England. Unfortunately, because of the lack of wind in Jerusalem, the windmill has never worked.

Although Montefiore spent only a few days in Jerusalem in 1827, that visit changed his life. He resolved to increase his religious observance and to attend synagogue on Saturdays, Mondays and Thursdays. And indeed, while his observance of Jewish law was perhaps not strict in his younger years – the most often-quoted evidence being Judith's descriptions of the meals they enjoyed in inns along the south coast of England on their honeymoon in 1812 – from that time on, he lived a life of dignified and devoted piety and observance.

Interestingly, a key document relating to his work for Zion is, via the generosity of a local bibliophile, now in the University of Toronto Library. The ornate artifact, important for the light it sheds on the early Hovevei Tsion organization, is a tribute to Moses Montefiore on his 100th birthday from 20 Jewish communities across Poland and Russia.

Sir Moses Montefiore

Montefiore's life was also inextricably bound up with the city of Ramsgate, Kent, on the southeastern coast of England. In the 1830s, he and Judith had bought East Cliff Lodge, a country estate then adjacent to the town, very much in the manner of the Victorian Jewish gentry. He played a huge part in the affairs of Ramsgate and one of the local ridings still bears his name.

In 1873, a local newspaper mistakenly ran his obituary.

"Thank God to have been able to hear of the rumour," he wrote to the editor, "and to read an account of the same with my own eyes, without using spectacles."

The town celebrated his 99th and his 100th birthdays in great style, and every local charity and church benefited from his philanthropy.

At East Cliff Lodge, he established a Sephardi yeshiva (Judith Lady Montefiore College) after Judith's death in 1862. In the grounds of the house, he built a beautiful and ornate Italianate synagogue; next to it he built a mausoleum modelled on Rachel's Tomb outside Bethlehem (whose refurbishment and upkeep he had paid for). There, in 1862, Judith was buried, and there, in 1885, he too was laid to rest.

One hundred and twenty years later, what remains of Sir Moses and his legacy? Those wishing to record the detailed story of his life and times work under a huge disadvantage. After his death, his heir, a nephew, apparently on instructions left by Sir Moses, burned virtually his entire archive of a century of life and work. In doing so, he destroyed a huge slice of history.

Montefiore's secretary, Dr. Loewe (himself an interesting character), also took part in the burning, but "rescued" some diaries, which he published a few years after Montefiore's death. They are at best fragmentary, and it is very difficult to distinguish Montefiore's writing from Loewe's commentaries and embellishments. The originals seem to be lost.

East Cliff Lodge, eventually inherited by uninterested family, is in ruins, and the grounds of the estate have long ago been sold off and absorbed by the city of Ramsgate for parks and housing. The synagogue and the mausoleum stand isolated. The present trustees of the estate have long wished to reinter the remains of Sir Moses and Lady Judith in Israel, but they have been vocally opposed by haredi groups in London who have taken up the cause of leaving Sir Moses undisturbed.

Poignantly, several final acts of the Montefiore legacy have recently played out. Last year, the collection of rare manuscripts from the yeshiva library was sold by the trustees of the Montefiore Endowment at Sotheby's in New York for over $9 million (Cdn), the proceeds to be devoted to funding the training of rabbis to serve Sephardi communities.

The printed books, including Sir Moses' personal library, were purchased as a philanthropic gesture by a foundation bearing the name of the famous Foyle bookselling family, and presented to the Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies. No British Jewish source could be found willing to buy and preserve the collection. On the announcement of the Foyles' gift, a large private archive of Montefioriana surfaced, held by descendants of the chazzan of Montefiore's synagogue in Ramsgate, including material that he had apparently saved from the fire. It, too, was deposited in Oxford.

But the most bizarre event was the recent death at age 85, just two months ago, of the most famous modern bearer of the Montefiore name in Britain – the Rt.-Rev. Hugh Montefiore, great-great-nephew of Sir Moses, an eminent Anglican and the former Bishop of Birmingham. Sadly, Bishop Hugh was probably the most religious of the hundreds of Montefiore descendants.

Opinions

Settlers need compensation

As Israel prepares for the relocation of the settlers from Gush Katif, many fear internal disruptions and unpleasantness. The controversy is so dominant that even the terms of description are contentious. Is it a disengagement, a pullout, resettlement, return, abandonment, eviction or expulsion? Is it hasty or timely?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Whatever the description, it has surely caused a great rift in Israel and in the Diaspora. And wherever you go, people want to talk about it. They do not necessarily want to listen, but most have very strong opinions that they wish to pronounce with great authority, myself included.

But I do not want to address the controversy itself. Rather, I would speak with you about the way in which we formulate our opinions. Upon what kind of information do we rely and what is its source? Do we know enough of the story?

The Israeli government, a duly elected democratic government, has determined that Israel's safety requires the elimination of Gaza from Israeli territory. Those in agreement and those opposed have argued and debated. There are rational, religious and emotional factors on both sides. It is clearly a very painful decision.

My brother-in-law and his family live in Gaza: it has been their home for 25 years. They went there because Israel told them to be pioneers : "We need you there." And now they are prepared to leave, but the distress and sense of loss is authentic. And they cannot find the means to leave!

Since the Israeli government wants the settlers to move, one might think that they would facilitate the move with all due speed. But that is not the case. Some might believe that the settlers uniformly do not want to move. Again, this is not so clear. If a family is willing to move to caravans whilst the government decides to build homes and then does so, fine. But if a family decides to choose their next location, they are in a quandary. The government has declared that it would reimburse the settlers, but when? One might think a government besieged by those unwilling to move, would do everything in its power to aid those willing to move.

But bureaucratic wheels turn ever so slowly. And Israel certainly has a bureaucracy! First one must apply for reimbursement. There are forms to fill and lawyers to hire. Then an official must come to measure the property. Finally, someone must decide how much the property is worth.

So with less than a month to go, have you seen the money? How can a family move? All they have is literally invested there. No money, no new home, no move. So some settlers are still there because the government that wants them to move cannot find the means to facilitate that move. Ridiculous.

What we should really worry about...

The Supreme Court of Canada, Parliament and the senate have all agreed: gay marriage in Canada is legal. And the negative reaction from some provinces, religious leaders and conservative politicians, as well as some men and women on the street, is going to continue for some time.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

At the same time – this morning, as a matter of fact – the sun did not rise in the west, but continued to rise in the east. Somewhere in British Columbia it was raining. Mosquitoes patrolled Winnipeg streets, looking for hapless pedestrians to bite. Ontario and Quebec still had a heat wave. Newfoundland is still a Rock. Our national animal is still the beaver.

The Apocalypse did not happen. So let's all take a deep breath.

The Torah has several passages condemning homosexuality – by inference, male homosexuality, since women's lesbian proclivities were of little interest in biblical or rabbinic world views. But the world of then, where temple prostitution and Hellenistic practices scandalized the rabbis, is not the world of now. Some men love men, some women love women, and that is apparently how God made them. (See most scientific thought on the matter.)

However small the references to homosexuality in the Torah, magnify those references a thousand thousand times and you will get the number of admonitions to end poverty and injustice. That is where Judaism, rabbinic ethics and our own moral centre should be focused, not on whether Jules marries Jim.

The prophetic voice is Judaism's unique gift to western thought and jurisprudence. "You have sold the needy for a pair of shoes," thundered the prophet. "You grind the faces of the poor." And you will pay, with the destruction of your nation.

"Justice, justice shall you pursue." The Hebrew is powerful – pursue it, as a fleeing goal, with all your might.

"Care for the widow and orphan." Over and over again, prophets admonish us to an ethical life. Do they spend years moaning about gay marriage? Nope. Do they confront kings and priests in the court and temple over lesbian love? Nope. They have their inner eye on the main injustices of society, and their outward message, though it costs them their lives, on our behaviour towards our fellow creatures in distress and need. Both as individuals and as a state, we are compelled to act justly, do mercy, deliver tzedakah in a Godly way.

Not one word about gay marriage.

Of course, prophets never anticipated our modern world's recognition of gay relationships. But gay marriage will not destroy western democratic institutions. What does threaten them is the increasingly chilly response to social need on the part of neoconservatives. To chip away at the prophetic message is far more dangerous to a caring society than gay marriage is.

If politicians and opponents of gay marriage stopped hand-wringing over gay issues and started really attending to issues of social justice, income inequality and populations at risk, we would have a better, more caring society. If we obstruct gay marriages, we will not create a more caring society. That's the ethical truth of the matter.

Will this decision lead to incest and bestiality? Last time I looked, those were practices of the heterosexual population. Rape? It's a man's attack on a woman – and blazingly heterosexual. Pedophiles? How they even get mentioned in this debate is amazing, as they have no idea of what a loving adult relationship is. And here in British Columbia, we have our own little polygamous world in Bountiful, also heterosexual.

Certainly none of these outrages has anything at all to do with gay marriage.

Is marriage as an institution under threat, now that gay and lesbian marriages are as normal, or as normally dysfunctional, as heterosexual ones? Give me a break. Where over 50 per cent of heterosexual marriages fail, how strong an institution is it? Parenting? I'll take loving lesbian parents any day over uncaring, dysfunctional heterosexual ones. Gays will be as good – or as bad – at the daily tasks of family life as anyone else. You'll know they have succeeded when the gay divorce rate catches up with heterosexual divorce.

Our tradition teaches us to worry about the poor being sold for a pair of shoes. Let's leave gay couples alone to find their own happiness.

Politics and religion

Last month, I wrote about the growing influence of organized religion in politics in Canada and elsewhere.

In the United States, this trend has led to major court decisions respecting the public display of the Ten Commandments in legislative buildings and courthouses. In the course of a U.S. House of Representatives debate relating to proselytizing at a U.S. Air Force academy, Indiana Congressman John Hostettler stated that Democrats were waging a "war on Christianity" and were "denigrating and demonizing Christians." Another congressman, Joel Hefley, commented during the same debate that he didn't think that Congress should "scrub religion or faith from all aspects of our public life."

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

In Israel, we have often witnessed how smaller religious parties in the Knesset have extracted political concessions with respect to religious issues through the threat of withholding support for non-religious issues. This has allowed the survival of various coalition governments over the years.

In Australia, legislator Ashraf Choudhary recently supported the stoning of homosexuals and adulterers in an interpretation of sharia or Islamic law in a way that would prescribe that punishment.

Here in Canada, we are experiencing an increase in the influence of religion on politics. Recently, the issue that seemed to exacerbate this trend was that of same-sex marriage. For example, in the Roman Catholic diocese of London, Bishop Ronald Fabbro recently barred member of Parliament Joe Comartin of Windsor from continuing to teach marriage classes at his church because of his support of the same sex-marriage legislation, Bill C-38. MP Charlie Angus was denied communion by his local bishop as a result of his support of Bill C-38. In the Senate debate on Bill C-38, Senator Marilyn Trenholme Counsell decided to support the legislation after reflecting that "as a Christian I often ask myself: 'What would Jesus do?'"

The difficulty in mixing politics and religion is multifaceted.

A concern arises if particular religious beliefs dominate and influence policy decisions. Given that the majority of Canadians who hold religious beliefs subscribe to a form of Christian theology, arguably, the voices of less prominent religions could be impaired in the making of policy.

Another problem relates to whether a religious characterization of a given issue addresses its underlying rationale. For example, with respect to the issue of stem cell research, should a religious underpinning dominate the debate or should the scientific and medical potential of this research be the dominant factor in the making of a policy decision?

Also, some issues are truly secular in nature. For example, laws that address misleading advertising have no religious component.

The criminal law in Canada has always been somewhat of a moral statement and debates over amendments to the Criminal Code often contain a moral dimension. When the late prime minister Pierre Trudeau declared that the state has no business in the nation's bedrooms, was he not essentially arguing for a greater separation of church and state? Are we now returning to a lessening of that separation in the debate, for example, over same-sex marriage?

Morality and religion, however, do not necessarily coincide. A given policy may be morally principled but not dependent upon a religious foundation. And a given religious dictate, such as a jihad that advocates hate and violence, may objectively be morally unprincipled.

Canada is not and should not emulate those states that are theocratic or religious-based in nature. But rather, the test that ought to guide us in making policy is what constitutes the best interest of Canada and Canadians. And the best interests ought to be informed by the various values and principles that are enshrined in our basic constitutional instruments. These include the preservation and protection of our fundamental freedoms, egalitarianism, multiculturalism and the various other constitutional principles that we, as Canadians, cherish and respect.

Politics has been described as the art of influence. When religion assumes a dominant role in the formulation of public policy, the public is essentially being influenced on the basis of faith-based ideology rather than on an arguably more impartial basis. Religious politics may lead to beneficial decision-making, but it may also lead to a particular, parochial and narrow view as to what is in the best interest of the nation.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

The Middle East never ceases to fascinate. Here are a few new books that will add to your knowledge of this historically, strategically important region.

Bernard Lewis, one of the most accomplished Mideast scholars, offers readers penetrating insights in From Babel to Dragomans (Oxford University Press). Consisting of more than 50 previously published pieces on topics ranging from Israel to Islam, this book sparkles with erudition. The Road To Martyrs' Square: A Journey into the World of the Suicide Bomber (Oxford University Press), by Anne Marie Oliver and Paul Steinberg, explores the cult of martyrdom among Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank through interviews and graffiti, videotapes, audiotapes and posters. The paperback edition of Arafat's War (Publishers Group Canada), by Efraim Karsh, was released before Palestinian Authority Yasser Arafat's death last November. Karsh claims he sought Israel's destruction.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The 2003 allied invasion of Iraq is still being debated, and in A War Against Truth (Raincoast Books), Canadian journalist Paul William Roberts, who was there during much of the fighting, argues that it was an ill-considered enterprise. He delves deeply into Iraqi society, but some of his observations are questionable. Seymour Hersh, the muckraking American reporter, brings his talents to bear in Chain of Command: The Road from 9/11 to Abu Ghraib (HarperCollins). It's generally an intriguing account of the events from Sept. 11, 2001, but his pieces on Afghanistan are musty and dated. Jane Corbin's Al-Qaeda (Thunder's Mouth Press/Nation Books) is a thorough analysis of an Islamic fundamentalist organization whose capacity for causing harm to western interests, she warns, should not be underestimated.

Brutal Truths, Fragile Myths: Power Politics and Western Adventurism in the Arab World (HarperCollins), by Mark Huband, examines the current state of the Mideast from a hard left-wing perspective. His notion of the Arab-Israeli conflict is simplistic. The Oxford Dictionary of Islam (Oxford University Press), by John Esposito, contains more than 2,000 entries and focuses mainly on the 19th and 20th centuries. Read it in conjunction with F.E. Peters' Islam: A Guide for Jews and Christians (Princeton University Press) and I Believe In... Christian, Jewish and Muslim Young People Speak about Their Faith (Publishers Group Canada). Both are quite informative. Standing Alone in Mecca: An American Woman's Struggle for the Soul of Islam (HarperCollins), by Asra Nomani, a seasoned journalist born in India and raised in the United States, contends that contemporary Islam is sexist and intolerant and denies women basic rights. Saudi Arabia (Raincoast Books), a Lonely Planet guide to a seemingly impenetrable country, parts the veil to some extent. Tree of Souls: The Mythology of Judaism (Oxford University Press), by Howard Schwartz, is billed as the first such anthology in English. It draws on the Bible, the Talmud, medieval folktales and chassidic texts.

The Middle East Under Rome (Harvard University Press) is an excellent introduction to an obscure subject. Covering the era from Rome's conquest to the end of the third century CE, with chapters on Bar Kokhba's revolt and the position of Jews in Syria, Maurice Sartre's magnum opus is rich in scholarship. The Temple of Jerusalem (Harvard University Press), by Simon Goldhill, is an illuminating meditation on cultural and religious memory. Built by Herod and destroyed by Roman Emperor Titus, the temple is a potent symbol of the human search for a lost ideal and an image of greatness. Travellers will appreciate HarperCollins' Middle East map. Published on a scale of 1: 4 million, it's top-notch in terms of quality.

The Holocaust is embedded in our consciousness. Consider these books: When Courage Was Stronger Than Fear (Publishers Group Canada), by Peter Hellman, is composed of six inspirational stories about Christians and Muslims who saved Jews. Oskar Schindler (HarperCollins), by David Crowe, is a slightly revisionist take on the German industrialist whose "list" is still the stuff of legend.

Approaching the Holocaust: Texts and Contexts (Vallentine Mitchell), by Robert Rozett, is a useful primer on issues raised by this catastrophe. In Resilience and Courage (Yale University Press), Nechama Tec, a survivor herself, skillfully traces the different ways in which men and women coped with the Nazi terror. Eva Hoffman, in After Such Knowledge: Memory, History and the Legacy of the Holocaust (Public Affairs), grapples with two interrelated issues: how the memories of survivors can be passed on to their children, and how they, the sons and daughters, can keep these memories alive. Nine Suitcases (Pimlico) by Bela Zsolt, a Hungarian survivor, is a top-notch memoir.

When British soldiers liberated Bergen-Belsen 60 years ago, they came upon unrelieved scenes of horror. In Remembering Belsen: Eyewitnesses Record the Liberation (Vallentine Mitchell), edited by Ben Flanagan and Donald Bloxham, former inmates, soldiers and aid workers recall that moment. Theresienstadt: Hitler's Gift to the Jews (University of North Carolina Press), edited by Joel Shatzky, is a gripping account by survivor Norbert Troller, complete with his drawings and watercolours. Irmgard Hunt, the model of a blond German Aryan, grew up in Bavaria during the Third Reich. In her memoir, On Hitler's Mountain: Overcoming the Legacy of a Nazi Childhood (HarperCollins), she recalls that period with piercing clarity, integrity and honesty.

Two and a half years ago, the University of Toronto hosted an edifying conference on present-day anti-Semitism. The proceedings are found in Contemporary Anti-Semitism: Canada and the World (University of Toronto Press), edited by Derek Penslar, Michael Marrus and Janice Gross Stein, three of the participants.

Sir Martin Gilbert, the prolific British historian, is at it again. In Dearest Auntie Fori: The Story of the Jewish People (HarperCollins), he deftly traces the history of Jews from biblical times right up to the modern age. The Jewish Century (Princeton University Press), by Yuri Slezkine, probes the course of Jewish history in our times with originality and verve. Walking the Bible: An Illustrated Journey for Kids through the Greatest Stories Ever Told (HarperCollins), by Bruce Feiler, is a spinoff of the original adult edition, Walking the Bible. Budding Toronto novelist Anna Morgan has written Daughters of the Ark (Second Story Press), an engrossing children's book turning on Ethiopian Jews fleeing the ravages of famine and persecution in the hope of reaching Israel. The audio version of Michael Chabon's terrific novel, The Final Solution (HarperCollins), has been released. Words on Fire: The Unfinished Story of Yiddish (Perseus Books), by Dovid Katz, is a lively, comprehensive examination of a language whose demise has been repeatedly predicted. The 13th edition of David Harduff's Transliterated English-Hebrew Dictionary (Monoline Press), a labour of love, has been published.

Our cousins in the United States have thrived. Five books attest to that fact. The Jews of the United States (University of California Press), by Hasia Diner, is first rate. In Jews and the American Soul (Princeton University Press), Andrew Heinze marshals a grand array of evidence to argue that Jewish values have helped shape American society. Lee Shai Weissbach, in Jewish Life in Small-Town America (Yale University Press), looks at 490 communities through the prism of migration patterns, education, marriage and occupations. A tour de force. Arthur Miller, the playwright, is the subject of Martin Gottfried's fine biography, Arthur Miller: His Life and Work (HarperCollins). Raphael Soyer (1899-1987) was a Russian American painter whose representations of workers and urban landscapes established his reputation. Samantha Baskind's Raphael Soyer & the Search for Modern Jewish Art (University of North Carolina Press) is a sharp, empathetic portrait of an acclaimed artist.

The Complete International Jewish Cookbook (Raincoast Books), by Evelyn Rose, is filled with wonderful recipes. A companion volume by Matthew Goodman, The World At Table: Jewish Food (HarperCollins), which contains solid essays, will certainly whet your appetite. Food and Judaism (University of Nebraska Press), edited by Leonard Greenspoon, Ronald Simkins and Gerald Shapiro, is thought-provoking. Classic Italian Jewish Cooking (HarperCollins), by Edda Servi Machlin, dishes up easy-to-follow recipes and advice.

In general: Firefly Books has published two beautifully crafted calendars for 2006 – "The Canadian Landscape" and "Tom Thomson." David Campbell's A Land of Ghosts (Thomas Allen & Son) evokes the magnificence of the Amazon wilderness with amazing grace. The Canadian Traveller's Diary (Raincoast Books) dispenses important information and leaves plenty of room for recording trip details. An ideal gift. New York City (Raincoast) is a superb guide to the Big Apple. Guide to the State of the World (Firefly) is a concise but authoritative overview of our universe. 23 Days in July (Perseus), by John Wilcockson, is a blow-by-blow account of legendary cyclist Lance Armstrong's sixth consecutive Tour de France victory. The Great Mortality (HarperCollins), by John Kelly, is a gripping tale of the Black Death, Europe's worst natural disaster. Repression and Resistance: Canadian Human Rights Activists 1930-1960 (University of Toronto Press), by Ross Lambertson, is scholarly yet hard-hitting.

Day of Peace

About 320 teenagers and their counsellors from eight Jewish camps were involved in CAMP-8, a "day of peace" held at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith last week. The event, co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, culminated in presentations on environmental or peace issues. Other participating camps were George, Gesher, Ramah, Shomria and Solelim. Moshava and Shalom were unable to attend, but will be included in a September follow-up. Prime minister, premier congratulate Toronto centenarian

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Torontonian Rose Friedman, who arrived in Canada from the Russian province of White Russia (Belarus) in 1908, celebrated her 100th birthday at two parties in mid-July, one at the home of a granddaughter and the other at the Apotex Centre where she is a resident.

Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin and Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty sent congratulatory letters to her.

Rose is the only surviving child of eight children born to Shmuel Chaim and Sara Basha Rubinoff. Her father delivered bread by horse and wagon for a Toronto bakery.

Rose was long active in the Canadian Cancer Society and was a founder of the Sinai service group at the original Mount Sinai Hospital on Yorkville Avenue, where she and her mother used to prepare bandages.

"My mother's life was based on helping others – she was always doing for others," said her daughter, Lorraine Levene. "Her life was dedicated to service. It was what she believed in."

Rose grew up in a poor family and had to be kept home from school one winter because she lacked shoes; the city eventually provided her with a pair.

She took various factory jobs from about the age of 10. After her marriage, she worked in a family dry-goods business and later as a saleslady in a ladies-wear store at King and Roncesvalles. She retired only when the store closed; she was by then in her early 80s.

Rose Friedman celebrated her 100th birthday on July 11th with many friends and relatives, including Noa Popper, who celebrated her first birthday a few days earlier.

Rose and her late husband Max Friedman were early members of the Pride of Israel Society. They were also founding members of the Agudas Hamispoche, a family organization founded in 1928 to keep members of the Rubinoff and Naftolin families from drifting apart. The organization still conducts monthly family breakfasts and recently marked its 77th anniversary.

She met Max about 1924 and although she initially wasn't keen on him, he was crazy about her. What ultimately brought them together was their mutual love of dancing. They won two silver loving cups as first prize in a city waltz contest in 1925 and were married in 1926.

In the first year of marriage, they were given a free room in a home whose owners owed a large debt to her father for bread. She would call it one of the happiest years of her life. Their daughter Lorraine was born in 1929, their son Edward in 1940.

"My parents had an extremely loving relationship," Levene said. "Even when my father was 92 years old and she was 89, she would say, 'Tell him to take his hands off me – he won't leave me alone!' It was a love story."

Max ran an Imperial Oil gas station at College and Major streets for 30 years, in partnership with his brother-in-law Ben Rubinoff. He died in 1995, two months short of the couple's 69th wedding anniversary.

Rose was a great knitter of sweaters, skirts and other items for her two children and others. Considered a marvelous cook, she was famous for her strudel and cakes.

"She still helps me make the gefilte fish," Levene said. "She chops it up in the wooden bowl that was my grandmother's, using the hockmesser, the chopping knife. We still do that. She's the only one who knows the right texture."

Rose Friedman with her children Edward and Lorraine.

Rose's family party was attended by her children and their spouses, six grandchildren, eight great-grandchildren and about 60 nieces and nephews, each of whom posed for an individual photograph with her. After the singing of Happy Birthday she made a brief speech in which she thanked everyone and told them how special the day was to her.

Her daughter Lorraine is married to Stan Levene and is executive director of Na'amat Canada in Toronto. Her son Edward Friedman is married to Barbara and is president of Moda at Home Inc. of Toronto.

Green family reunion planned to maintain strong bond

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

The descendants of Ethel and Sandor Gruen have a familial bond so strong that they'd be willing to travel from all over North America to meet for a weekend.

On the weekend of August 18 to 22, about 150 family members will gather at the Blue Mountain Resort in Collingwood, Ont., for a family reunion.

The family, ranging in age from 2 to 89, will be meeting for the first time since their last reunion, which took place in Florida in December 1997.

Ages range from 2 to 89

"This day and age, people are so busy, but we have such a strong bond and we always make great attempts to keep in touch," said Rita Hoffman, the great-granddaughter of the Gruens, whose descendants are now known as Greens.

Hoffman is excited to reconnect with her family that comes from cities all over North America, including Ottawa, California, Philadelphia, Florida, Chicago and elsewhere.

"I feel isolated in Canada. I only have a few cousins here," she said. "My children are so excited to meet cousins their age."

There are a number of activities planned, including dinners with the whole group, performances by professional musicians in the family, a play, "the not-so-newlywed game and lively discussions," Hoffman said.

Victoria Fisher from Florida, who planned this with the intention of reconnecting her grandfather with his cousins, promised that there would be many organized activities the whole family can enjoy, such as bike rides, tennis matches, bonfires, talent shows and spa treatments.

They are also coming together to record family recipes to publish a cookbook, and to be part of a family portrait.

Hoffman said she expects the reunion to be as fun and light-hearted as the last one, but also very touching as some of the members of the older generation will share their stories about escaping Europe before World War II.

The Gruens lived in Tuterbesh, Hungary, a border town that once belonged to Romania in the early 1900s.

"They owned a bit of land, which was used for growing grapes to make wine, and they owned a tavern," said Hoffman of her great grandparents. She said they had many gypsies living on their land in exchange for their labour, performances at the tavern, and other household duties.

Her great-grandfather Sandor, eventually moved to the United States with three of his sons. Finding it hard to adjust to life there, he returned home, but his sons remained and developed businesses there, always remembering to send money home to the rest of the family, Hoffman said.

Of the Gruens' 11 children, seven eventually made the decision to migrate to North America before the war. The four that remained were sent to concentration or labour camps where they perished.

"This is something everyone always takes interest in. There is a connection there," she said.

"We have a lot of pride in this family and we want to pass that down to our children."

Post-disengagement future debated

But if Israel's withdrawal is not accompanied by concrete concessions to the Palestinians, Hamas and other extreme organizations will proclaim it as a victory under fire and make gains at the expense of the Palestinian Authority, he added.

For disengagement to yield positive results, Israel must take a series of key steps, advised Shikaki, whose brother was assassinated by Israel about a decade ago when he was leader of Islamic Jihad.

Israel should co-ordinate its withdrawal with the Palestinian Authority, permit the Palestinians to re-open their airport and seaport in Gaza so as to bolster their anemic economy, stop settlement activity in the West Bank, agree to permanent status talks and allow all Palestinian police to be armed, he said.

Under such circumstances, the Palestinian Authority could consolidate the truce, collect illegal arms, disband militias and end all violence. But Sharon will not carry out these measures and Gaza will become little more than a "big prison" for the Palestinians, Shikaki commented.

A leading authority on Palestinian popular attitudes toward Israel, Shikaki said that upward of 85 per cent of Palestinians want the current and much-violated ceasefire to continue.

In a sharp critique of the Palestinian Authority, he said it has failed to provide good governance and delivery of social services and is riddled with corruption.

Abbas must confront and arrest corrupt officials, Shikaki said, but he is beholden to many of these figures, who helped him attain power after Arafat's death last November.

Bringing the community together

Friends and colleagues extol the legacy of Rabbi Yitzak Witty z'l

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

The legacy of Rabbi Yitzak Witty z'l, who passed away on July 30, is rich and far reaching, according to his friends and former colleagues. It will long be celebrated, they say, by all those who came in contact with his generous spirit and quick mind. He is remembered as one of the community's greatest educational leaders and as a role model for his unique character and exceptional achievements.

Rabbi Witty, a graduate of Yeshiva University, was born in Brooklyn in 1932. Before settling in Toronto in 1969 to become the Executive Director of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), he worked as a teacher and principal in Philadelphia and Winnipeg, where he was also a pulpit rabbi for seven years. Rabbi Witty was to remain at the helm of BJE for 28 years, retiring from that post in 1997.

"Rabbi Witty was a community man; he paid attention to all segments of the community," said Dr. Aaron Nussbaum, a former Principal of United Synagogue Day School. "He would work with everyone, all the different ideological groups. He cared about everyone."

Dr. Nussbaum's sentiments were echoed by all the educational professionals who had the pleasure of working with Rabbi Witty in various capacities.

"Rabbi Witty made a place for everyone," remembered Bernie Shoub, the former Director of Finance for BJE. "He made tremendous efforts to maintain pluralism, bringing right and left together. He was also extremely driven and made things happen."

The evidence of his driving passion in making Jewish education a priority for Jewish children in Toronto is everywhere. It is in the legacy he left at BJE where Rabbi Witty guided the Board from a small supervisory body to a major source of tuition subsidies, funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto annual campaigns. It was in his advocacy efforts to lobby the government for financial assistance to Jewish schools, and in the significant role he played in the creation of the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School for Jewish children with learning disabilities. His devotion and enthusiasm were palpable in all that he worked for. His love of learning and teaching was infectious to those around him.

"Rabbi Witty was a man skilled in the languages and literature of his people, a man of many accents, a man of remarkable eloquence, a man of much music and a man of rich humour," noted Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President for Jewish Education and Identity. "With his many international contacts, he placed Toronto on the world stage of Jewish education."

"Rabbi Witty was frequently called upon to give lectures all over North America and Israel and he traveled the world," noted Rabbi Marvin Pachino, the retired Head Master of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). "He even traveled to Australia to develop programs there and lend moral support to their communities."

Even when Rabbi Witty retired from his post at BJE, he continued to work in the Jewish community, becoming the Executive Director of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library in 2002.

"He was an intellectual man, as well versed in Judaica as he was in secular matters," said Stuart Razin, the Executive Director of Friends of Yeshiva University in Toronto.

"Rabbi Witty was an excellent Hebraist and Yiddishist," Dr. Nussbaum concurred. He was a phenomenal speaker – a great scholar."

"He was my teacher in the early 1970s when I took a course at the BJE," explained Zita Gardner, retired director of Leo Baeck Day School. "He was so wonderful and exciting because he was excited about his subject matter, about what he was teaching us. Over the course of my 30 years in Jewish education he has been a true colleague, friend and teacher."

Those who were fortunate enough to have worked alongside Rabbi Witty take comfort in the knowledge that his rich legacy will live on through all those he influenced and the spirit of his life will continue to touch the community for years to come.

"It is what we do that makes a difference. It is how we decide vis-a-vis Jewish learning and, from that, not merely Jewish study but Jewish action that really makes the difference."

Rabbi Yitzak Witty, September 21, 1997

"Rabbi Witty has been and continues to be a warrier in the struggle against Jewish ignorance."

Joseph Steiner, former President of BJE and UJA Federation speaking at a community tribute September 21, 1997.

"There is no other community I can think of where once a month, heads of day schools of all denominations - from the secular to the Orthodox- come together to discuss matters of interest. That was Rabbi Witty, that was his doing, that was his accomplishment, and what will continue forever."

Yael Seliger, Associate Director of the BJE

"He was respected by the entire spectrum of the Jewish community and he respected all community members no matter what their religious affiliation."

Ted Sokolsky,
President UJA Federation

"Under his stewardship and with his foresight, abba has made Toronto's Jewish educational system the envy of Diaspora Jewish communities."

Rabbi Avraham Witty, speaking about his father at a community tribute, September 21, 1997.

"Rabbi Witty was a very caring individual. He convinced me to come back and teach at Talmud Torah even though I was hesitant. He was so supportive to the extent that he even helped me find someone to look after my children while I was teaching. He was that kind of person."

Gyta Nepom, teacher at the Talmud Torah in Winnipeg. Rabbi Witty was the Principal until 1969.

"He was a full personality, a real renaissance man, so capable of expressing himself. He was an exceptional person."

Allan Reitzes,
Past President, UJA Federation

For Israel, a balance: pragmatism and romanticism

By DORIT PERLMUTTER

Guest Voice

The young poet Chanah Senesh once wrote in her diary: "A voice called out and I went, I went – because a voice called out." When she immigrated to Palestine from Hungary in 1939, she was 18 years old, merely a teenager, yet she followed a dream and acted upon her vision of settling in and cultivating the land of Israel.

Senesh's experiences speak of the courage of a generation of young people who overcame numerous obstacles to establish the Jewish state.

It is important to remember her story today, as many young Jews living outside of Israel become disillusioned by the booming anti-Zionist rhetoric heard and felt in North America and other parts of the world. It is essential to look at past stories and recent experiences in and around Israel to restore a vision of Zionism for North American Jews. This would also help us reconcile the competing sets of values that ground us in Canada but also tie us to Israel.

Last year, I stood among a group of 27 young adults in the picturesque Kinneret Cemetery, listening to the tragic stories of Israel's earliest pioneers, some of whom are buried at this site. I was overcome with emotion.

My experiences as a North American Jew seem to pale in comparison to the experiences of the Jews from eastern Europe who dreamed of a return to Zion and journeyed long and hard to develop the land of Israel. They do not involve personal hardship, struggle or rejection. Rather, they begin with a sponsored trip to Budapest, Vienna and Israel, travelling on an 11-day leadership mission to "trace the roots of Zionism." This group venture, organized by the Hagshama Department of the World Zionist Organization, raised many questions about Jewish identity and Zionist beliefs.

The Kinneret burial grounds are shaded by palm trees that overlook the serene blue of the Sea of Galilee, a peaceful place with a number of heartbreaking legacies. A metaphor for Israel itself, the cemetery is home to Zionist pioneers from the first and second aliyot to Palestine, a handful of whom took their own lives as a result of the unexpected hardships they faced in trying to settle the land. Our tour guide told us that these "anti-hero" stories are not commonly told. Visitors are more likely to hear inspirational stories like those of the poet Rachel and the songwriter Naomi Shemer.

However, our guide's choice of stories reaffirmed my belief that it is a privilege to consider Israel our own.

When I was younger, I celebrated many of Israel's birthdays naively imagining it as a place that had always and will always exist. In all my years, Israel has been a reality. I have been fortunate to spend three summers there with family and friends. But it was only about five years ago, after the start of the second intifadah, that I truly understood Israel's infancy and vulnerability, when several groups cancelled their summer tours because of the outbreak of violence.

Our trip began in Budapest and Vienna in memory of Theodor Herzl, the founder of the Zionist movement. He was born in Budapest and lived most of his life in Vienna. Our experience of the cities, though brief, was an emotional paradox. On one hand, we met a Hungarian Holocaust survivor who stood with us as our group held a memorial ceremony beside the Danube, tossing roses into the river as a flute played a Hebrew song. We learned about Herzl's unpopular call to action and of the underground youth groups that subsequently formed in the name of Zionism. We also visited Herzl Square in Vienna, where our group sang Im Tirzu, Eyn Zo Agada (If you will it, it is no dream).

On the other hand, we felt detached and somewhat out of place too because of the lack of any Jewish presence in the cities and a sense that Holocaust remembrance there seemed all too obligatory.

At one point as our tour guide whisked us around Vienna, my attention was drawn to a courtyard where Hitler once rallied thousands of Nazis. Another moment, I saw a popular café that Jews had once owned. And even Herzl Square seemed overshadowed by the neighbouring Marriott Hotel.

I didn't sleep on the plane ride from Budapest to Israel and we landed early enough to watch the sunrise from the Yaffa shoreline. My feelings were similar to those of most Jews who express their overwhelming sense of "coming home" when the El Al doors open and brusque staff propel you on your way. There is no better way to experience Israel than coming directly from a country where Jewish life is practically non-existent and you question whether to wear a Magen David over your shirt, or even underneath it.

The emotional elation of my arrival in Israel, however, was somewhat tempered by journey's end. The photographs from the trip helped provide some clearer insight into the hardships of life in Israel. The first emerged from a picture I took at the Gan Hashoshanim (Park of Roses) in Jerusalem.

The photograph did not come out as I had intended. I recall seizing the photo opportunity, secretly trying to capture a vision of a happy Israeli family, mother and baby, enjoying an end-of-the-summer morning at a park. The mother, watching her son giggle and crawl on the picnic blanket littered with toys, was just as carefree as her infant. I had not intended to capture our 22-year-old Israeli medic, standing directly behind them on the paved path, an oversized Uzi strapped to his body. How had I not seen him when I took the picture? Was the young man, whom I grew to know on my trip, that inconspicuous, despite his wearing a gun while dressed in a T-shirt and cargos?

This picture made me doubt my love of a country in which it is normal to see teenagers with guns, fields cordoned off for mines, people passing through security gates to enter popular shopping areas like Ben Yehuda Street and communities segregated by religious affiliation. Other photos, however, helped allay my doubts.

What other nation is so technologically advanced yet also so steeped in religious and cultural history? What other place offers the warmth of a kibbutz experience, or the feeling that a kiosk vendor selling me a pita overflowing with falafel is as concerned about my satisfaction as he is with making his money, or the excitement of a random reunion, while standing by the Western Wall, with a guy from Washington D.C. who happened to be on my Israel teen tour eight years ago ?

One of our group's tasks was to conduct a survey of Israelis in Jerusalem about what it means to be Israeli. Our informal survey showed that Israelis feel strongly about their sense of Jewishness, speaking Hebrew, serving in the IDF, and they have a vision that Israel will not only survive but thrive. While Israelis will admit to feelings of grief or even numbness at the inexhaustible turmoil, it was astonishing to see and hear first hand their hopes and unwavering love for their "controversial" country.

It is months since I took that journey, yet I continually find myself trying to resolve my beliefs about Zionism while living out my hectic life as a teacher in Toronto. As I reflect, I do not see in myself the same fearless, courageous and unselfish qualities that so many Israelis possess. I would not have delayed my university education to serve my country, nor could I give up my safe home to live in Israel. However, since the trip, my new aspiration is to serve Israel for one year in its schools, to teach and immerse myself in Israeli communities.

There is a discrepancy for most of us between belief and practice. There are many Jewish Zionists living outside of Israel who share similar values and respect for Jewish ideals yet fail to follow through with the vital legwork needed to express them.

The goals we set with regard to our own activism and Israel's place in our lives should be a blend of realism and idealism. It is so difficult to compromise our practical needs and desires with larger hopes and dreams. The struggle lies in taking the leap from faith to action, and reconciling that action with a balance of pragmatism and romanticism.

Dorit Perlmutter lives in Toronto.

Jewish Life

An honest account of a childhood

Omaha Blues: A Memory Loop* by Joseph Lelyveld; Farrar, Straus and Giroux.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Arthur J. Lelyveld – brilliant, articulate, hard-working and idealistic – had a long and distinguished career. He was, for 38 years, rabbi and rabbi emeritus of a large and prestigious Reform temple in Cleveland. He served as president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis and shared his unbounded energy and enthusiasm with a spectrum of Jewish organizations.

In his early years, he worked unceasingly for the Zionist cause and was director of the Hillel Foundation. When he was 23, he joined an impressive delegation to the Oval Office to plead with a wavering Harry Truman for the establishment of a Jewish state.

Undoubtedly, Rabbi Lelyveld is best known for his foray into Mississippi to participate in a voter registration project for black citizens. He was beaten with a tire iron and narrowly escaped severe brain injury. This occurred in the wake of the abduction, disappearance and presumed murder of three young civil rights workers in 1964 – James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner.

Joseph Lelyveld, formerly the executive editor of the New York Times, in this chronicle of his childhood and adolescence, prefers to call his story a "memory loop," rather than a memoir or autobiography. It is an attempt to untangle the knots of his own past by exploring "things I half understood or never grasped at all while they were happening in my boyhood."

Young Joseph had a difficult and unhappy time. His mother, Toby, beautiful and talented, was emotionally unstable and found the role of a rabbi's wife burdensome and unpalatable. She found Omaha, the city of her husband's first congregation, provincial and deadening to the spirit. She was eager to live in exciting New York, to study at Columbia University and to work on her book about Shakespeare, eventually published as Shylock on the Stage.

Between the frequent travels of his father and the irresponsibility of his mother, Joseph felt neglected and unloved. He found a close, understanding and warm surrogate in Rabbi Ben Lowell, a friend of his father's, who took the reticent and troubled youth under his wing. "Dad" always had his son's respect, but it is Ben whom the son recalls with unabashed filial love.

Rabbi Lowell, whose story occupies a considerable portion of the book, was a liberal who had been fired from his congregation in Montgomery, Ala., for publicly taking the side of the Scottsboro boys, nine young black men falsely accused of raping two white women. The men were on death row in a Montgomery jail.

Increasingly involved in a variety of communist front organizations, Lowell became the object of widespread criticism. Rabbi Lelyveld, in a painful decision, was forced to dismiss him from his Hillel University position.

After a number of separations, punctuated by Toby Lelyveld's several suicide attempts, the Lelyvelds' 30-year-old marriage was dissolved.

In a recent interview, the author, 67, confided: "I have never had any trouble feeling Jewish. I did drift away. I moved away from any participation in religious observance. I came to have issues with the whole notion of worship, and a lot of the prayers, beautiful as they are – despite the fact that I've heard them all my life – ceased to ring true to me. Basically, my attendance in synagogue as an adult was largely limited to where my father was preaching."

At his father's funeral in the Cleveland temple, the large congregation of mourners sang We Shall Overcome. As the eulogies lengthened, the author writes, "I imagined a little boy with curly blond hair… running up a slight slope, through high grass, on a summery day. The little boy was calling, 'Daddy, Daddy…'"

This is an honest, unflinching account of a childhood, disturbed by the tormented marriage of two gifted individuals. Brilliantly written, it is an affecting family history as well as a mirror held up to a troubled period in American social history.

Blogs on the disengagement

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The clock is ticking down for the Jewish residents of Gaza and four settlements in the West Bank. With the disengagement story changing hourly, any news organization would be hard-pressed to be able to keep tabs on everything that is happening. That is why bloggers play such an important role. You can follow stories as they unfold while gaining insights into deeply held passions on both sides of the issue.

A good place to start is Technorati. Technorati is a search engine that indexes more than 13 million blogs on a huge variety of topics. Its disengagement section points you to excerpts from blogs, each with a one or two sentence summary. (I should point out that I came across far more blogs opposing disengagement than supporting it.) [http://technorati.com/tag/disengagement]

A sampling of the blogs follows:

"The thousands of supporters who encamped at Kfar Maimon on the road to Gush Katif are the true Zionists of our times… They are not just standing for the 10,000 Jews who will be expelled from their homes, but they are protesting to protect the entire nation." [www.dis-engage.org/]

"Dear Mr. Prime Minister, 'Thank you for the royal treatment we received over the past few days. Although the treatment is rough, you have helped our cause immensely… People are beginning to awake, to see how their leaders have lost touch with democracy and are trying to stifle dissent in any way, and are trampling democratic rights in the process. Thanks for all the help you have given us in our battle to save Gush Katif.'" [www.israelreporter.com/]

"Demonstrations and political activism are a waste of time. You can't fight a physically stronger adversary on physical terms. The struggle to rescind an evil edict – especially one that calls for the expulsion of thousands of Jews from their homes – should be a spiritual one, especially if we're the ones with the superior spiritual strength. Government instigators can't infiltrate our prayers." [http://tinyurl.com/a22gu]

Nahum Barnea has an interesting article at the Americans for Peace Now site. He talks about how the conflict over disengagement has manifested itself throughout Israel as a kind of colour war. The "anti" forces have adopted orange, while the "pro" side has opted for blue and white or just plain blue. He points out that although opinion polls indicated that most Israelis have supported disengagement, you'd never know from all the orange ribbons flapping from car antennas. [http://tinyurl.com/bc8w3]

You'll find no orange ribbon on this blogger's car. "I have seen the enemy, and it is orange. It must be the most successful marketing campaign in history. The colour orange is so strongly identified with the settler/anti-disengagement movement that I automatically become suspicious of anyone and anything with the color orange… I feel funny getting in taxis that have an orange ribbon… as if I'm actually contributing money directly to the anti-disengagement movement." [www.somethingsomething.blogspot.com/]

"My heart is with the security forces – army, police, out there for two days now in this terrible humidity and heat. Instead of fighting terrorism, fighting crime, they have to run after people opposed to the disengagement, who appear bent on forcibly preventing government policy from being carried out. They will not succeed." [http://imshin.net/]

After you've read through some blogs, you may want to take a look at the latest pictures from Gaza. Try Flickr.com. You may have read about Flickr after the recent bombings in London where witnesses with digital cameras and camera phones were able to take photos of the carnage and upload them to the web within hours. At Flickr, you can see both amateur and wire service photos about the disengagement. Just go to the home page [www.flickr.com] and type in a search term such as "gaza" or "disengagement." You'll find hundreds of photos, including shots of protesters and soldiers.

For the latest public opinion surveys, check out the Independent Media Review Analysis, which also has a daily summary of stories in the news. [http://imra.org.il/] And for more voices in the debate, visit these sites: the New Israel Fund [www.nif.org], Katif.net [http://english.katif.net/], Ti'ud [http://tiud.org] and Ariga [www.ariga.com].

And as for the disengagement countdown, you can watch the seconds tick away at IsraelReporter.com. [www.israelreporter.com/]

Toronto journalist receives fellowship

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

One of only 10 2005-2006 recipients of the nine-month Knight Science Journalism Fellowship, Toronto Star technology reporter Rachel Ross is on her way to Cambridge, Mass.

"I have always had a real love for and interest in science – it even dates back to kindergarten when I competed in a science fair, even though I was actually too young.

"When I applied for the fellowship, I didn't think I had a chance, and a lot of others thought it was a long shot too," said Ross, who builds robots in her spare time.

For the Star, Ross has written articles on subjects ranging from biotechnology to the chemistry of cosmetics. She has also written regular columns, one on the history of invention and another explaining the science behind household objects and materials.

Rachel Ross

She sees her participation in the fellowship as an opportunity for her to become "reinvigorated about science" without the worry of normal deadlines, since, according to the rules, fellows may not write professionally for the duration of the fellowship.

The goal of the fellowship is to have the journalists put aside their normally narrow focus on getting "the story," and enable them to explore science more broadly.

Ross also notes that she is always looking for the next big challenge that will help to further her career and this fellowship is another of those challenges.

Run by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University, the fellowship is designed for experienced journalists who cover science, technology, medicine or the environment. They must have at least three years of experience covering those areas. Other journalists who wish to gain expertise in these fields are also eligible but must have at least five years of experience.

There are no educational prerequisites. Fellows choose their own subjects, provided that they are in the fields of medicine, science and/or technology.

Ross has chosen to study tissue engineering, nanotechnology and environmental health science.

To cover her study tuition, she will receive $55,000, divided into nine instalments over the academic year. "They're actually paying me to study," she said.

Fellows are encouraged to study their subjects in depth, to learn the history of a field and to understand how scientists and engineers pursue their work.

Aside from the individually chosen areas of study, each fellow must attend twice-weekly seminars, laboratory visits and field trips arranged by the director. These are meant to bring the fellows up-to-date on current research and broaden their exposure to various fields of science. A number of seminars are devoted to the craft of science writing and issues involving interactions between science and society.

Ross, who has taken leave from the Star from September to the end of May, is the second Canadian to have been honoured with the fellowship since its inception more than 20 years ago.

Journalists from all countries compete on an equal basis. This year, Ross will be taking part along with six people from the United States, one from Poland, one from Australia and one from China.

Before joining the Star, Ross, who has a degree in journalism from Ryerson University where she now teaches online journalism, was an online editor and producer.

"This is a once in a lifetime opportunity for me," she said. "I am looking forward to finishing the fellowship with a better appreciation for the scientific challenges surrounding biotechnology. The more I understand about science, the better questions I'll be able to ask for my stories."

Postcards, diary add detail to story of Hana's Suitcase

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

George Brady isn't a particularly religious man, but as he sees it, there's got to be a higher power directing the unlikely series of events that are bringing to light his and his sister's wartime experiences in Theresienstadt.

Brady, of course, is the native of Czechoslovakia whose sister was Hana, the subject of a best-selling children's book, Hana's Suitcase, that has taken the world by storm. The book traces the siblings' childhood, Hana's last years in the Theresienstadt (Terezin) concentration camp, and her death in Auschwitz at age 13.

A few years ago, a replica of the suitcase she took with her to the Nazi death camp was found at the Auschwitz museum and forwarded to a Japanese Holocaust education centre. Brady was told of its existence and it sparked the writing of the book that has catapulted Hana's story to the consciousness of thousands of young people around the world.

Last May the series of incredible coincidences connected to the Bradys' story continued. It was Brady's birthday and just before going out to celebrate, he decided to check his e-mail. To his surprise, he found someone in the Czech Republic had sent him copies of the diary he had kept as a teenager in the barracks at Theresienstadt. He had long thought the diary and other wartime memorabilia gone, but almost miraculously, it had turned up again.

The tale of the missing diaries goes something like this: during December 2004, Tom Pavlovski, a student of history, was walking through the city of Brno in the Czech Republic when he came upon a dumpster. A family was clearing out their basement and at the top of the detritus some children's books caught his eye. Knowing his mother was a professor of drama and children's literature, he thought she might be interested in the books.

When he examined the pile, he found something even more interesting beneath. Just below the children's titles, were yellowed and worn books, papers and postcards. He rescued the material and delivered them to his mother.

A few weeks later, his mother happened to be reading a review of Hana's Suitcase, which had just been translated into Czech, when it occurred to her that the material retrieved from the dumpster might be connected to the unfortunate Czech girl. As it turned out, "many, many things were from Hana," Brady said.

The woman contacted the Jewish museum in Prague, which in turn asked a Roman Catholic priest to look into the case. The priest, Father Daniel Herman, had previously interviewed Brady for a publication printed by a Jewish/Christian friendship group and what's more, they are distantly related. Herman immediately made the connection to George Brady and arranged for copies of the material to be sent by e-mail to him in Toronto.

Among the papers found in the dumpster were a number of postcards sent by Hana, including at least one to her mother (though addressed to her aunt) in Auschwitz. That card was returned because it was eight lines long, more than the maximum six permitted by the Nazis, Brady said.

One of the more noteworthy items was a vintage family photograph, 90 years old, in which George recognized his grandparents and his mother, Marketta, as a young woman.

Also retrieved were George's diary "from the first day to the last day at Therezin." Brady, a native of the small Czech town of Nove Mesto, was deported to the the camp on May 18, 1942. The diary's last entry was in September 1944, five days before he was sent to Auschwitz.

Much of the contents are rather mundane. "My diary was mostly about food and soccer, because they were playing in the yard," Brady said.

But it also notes that in 1944, the boys were ordered to clean the pavement in Theresienstadt and were not allowed to walk on it until after visiting Red Cross officials had left. Another Nazi subterfuge recorded in the book was that children's swings and slides were brought out for the younger children to play on but were removed as soon as the Red Cross departed.

An original copy of the magazine, Forward, published by the girls in Hana's room at Theresienstadt, was also found. Twice it refers to Hana in passing.

Also in the pile was a diary entry that recorded the casualty toll at the camp. By June 1944, Brady wrote that 32,000 had died and 100,000 had been deported. Most of the dead were the elderly who succumbed to hunger or disease or who committed suicide, he said.

"What we found in the heap was some incredible stuff," he said.

Learning of the material on his birthday stirred deep feelings. "I had so many emotions...it was already in the garbage and it survived 60 years later. It is strange."

The fact that the first photo sent to him was of his mother "just showed me there was something guarding it and trying to tell me a message."

The coincidences continue. The house from which the material was being removed belonged to Brady's aunt's family. They were able to save much of the family memorabilia because his aunt's husband was gentile and was not deported. After the war, their daughter sent Brady most of the family documents that had been stored in the attic. Unbeknownst to her, other documents connected to the Bradys had been kept in the basement. It didn't occur to her son-in-law, who was cleaning out the basement, that valuable personal papers might be present.

Brady shakes his head at the coincidences. Speaking on the day the shuttle Discovery launched into space, he recalled that Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon was killed when the Columbia disintegrated on re-entry. Ramon, son of Holocaust survivors, carried with him a drawing of the moon's landscape imagining what the earth might look like from the moon. The drawing was penned by Petr Ginz, one of the 42 boys who shared the same room in Theresienstadt with Brady and who, like Brady was deported to Auschwitz. Frailer than Brady, Ginz, 16, was sent directly to the gas chambers on arrival while Brady was dispatched to a satellite camp where he worked cleaning railway cars.

Ramon, as it turned out, was killed on Ginz's birthday.

Brady has met Ramon's widow, brother and father along with Ginz's sister in Israel. Their story, along with that of the boys in the room in Theresienstadt, may be made into a film while the story of Hana's suitcase is being prepared for the stage by the Young People's Theatre in Toronto. It is set to premiere in March 2006.

When he first came to The CJN in 2000, he hoped his story would keep his sister's memory alive. At the time, he was in awe of the coincidence that had brought the suitcase to light. Karen Levine's award-winning book subsequently brought the story to thousands of children in the English-speaking world and it has been published in Japan, Germany, Holland, Italy, France, China, Korea, Thailand, Hungary, Poland, Finland, Spain, Iceland, Belgium, Norway, Israel, Mexico, Romania, Portugal and Turkey, among others.

"So many things are happening in my life," Brady said. "I cannot believe it is a coincidence."

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Recently, I was at Machane Yehuda (Jerusalem's "farmer's market"), and the gorgeous and succulent array of summer fruits was a wonderful sight to behold. And the best thing about these fruits is that they not only taste delicious, they are so very good for you! There is so much to choose from at this time of year that we should take advantage of the fabulous fruit that's in season now.

Fruit in general, although high in natural sugars, is good for health in many ways. The benefits just go on and on. So fill your grocery cart with an array of them and try to make sure that you include as many different fruits in your weekly and daily diet as you can to obtain maximum health benefits.

EVELYN ROSE'S FRESH APRICOT COMPOTE

This compote is delicious served plain or with ice cream for a cool and easy summer dessert. The dessert freezes well, but there will be some change in texture.

½ cup sugar
1½ cups water
1½ pounds fresh or frozen apricots
juice of ½ lemon

In a wide, shallow, lidded pan dissolve the sugar in the water over gentle heat, then bring to a boil and simmer until syrupy – about 5 minutes. Put in the fruit in one layer, cover and simmer very, very gently until almost fork tender – about 10 minutes. Add the lemon juice and leave covered to complete the cooking. Chill well. Makes 6 servings.

COLD MANGO SOUP WITH BERRY PUREE

This gorgeous, scrumptious soup is such a showstopper it's hard to believe how easy it is to make. Don't tell your guests that all it took was a bit of cutting and a few whirls of the blender!

4 medium mangos, peeled, seeded and cut into chunks
½ cup pineapple or orange juice
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tsp. honey
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. ground ginger
1 pinch ground cloves
1½ cups buttermilk*
1 cup fresh or frozen raspberries or blueberries
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice

*To make this soup pareve, add 1½ tbsp. of vinegar or lemon juice to 1½ cups soy milk or pareve creamer.

Combine the mangos in a blender or food processor with the pineapple juice, lemon juice, honey, cinnamon, ginger and cloves. Process until smooth.

Scrape the mixture into a 2-qt. container and stir in the buttermilk. Refrigerate for at least 2 hours, until thoroughly chilled.

To make the puree, process the berries and lemon juice in a blender or food processor until smooth. Strain to remove seeds. Pour into a plastic squeeze bottle with a small tip or into a small plastic zip-top bag, then refrigerate.

To serve, taste the soup for seasoning and check it for consistency: if you'd prefer it thinner, stir in up to 1 cup of milk or milk substitute. Divide the soup among 4 or 5 bowls. If using a bottle, squeeze the berry puree over each serving in a decorative pattern. If using a plastic bag, cut a tiny triangle from one corner and do the same. Makes 4-5 servings.

Note: the perfect tool for making stylish squiggles of puree on top of the soup is a plastic squeeze bottle with a thin tip. You can also use it for a similar restaurant-style presentation of chocolate syrup or almost any dish with a smooth sauce.

FROZEN FRUIT DELIGHT

Adapted from MMMMiami by C. Kotkin and K. Martin

Any fruit you prefer may be substituted.

1½ cups water
2 cups sugar
dash salt
2 lb. strawberries (may be frozen)
2 mashed bananas
10-12 oz. fresh or frozen raspberries
1 6-oz. can frozen orange juice concentrate
3 tbsp. lemon juice
4 egg whites, beaten stiff

In a large saucepan, boil ½ cup water with sugar and salt for 5 minutes. Remove from heat. Add rest of water, fruit and juices. Pour into metal container and freeze until slush.

Remove from freezer and beat thoroughly in mixer or food processor. Fold in egg whites and freeze. For a very smooth and creamy ice mixture, beat mixture once or twice more. Makes 12 servings.

Argos cheerleader dancing her way to the top of the sports marketing world

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Michelle Garber's ambition is to become one of a small number of women in the field of sports marketing.

But for now, she keeps herself occupied as a Toronto Argonaut cheerleader, a member of the York University dance team, a receptionist at Jewish Family & Child Service, and vice-president of Delta Pi, a Jewish sorority at York.

Michelle Garber

The third-year marketing student is, and always has been, a very busy girl who will do whatever it takes to get what she wants.

"I love sports," said Garber, 20, explaining why only sports marketing will do for a career.

"Now, it's becoming a really big field, very competitive. It's not the same as other boring types of marketing.

"Not many people know what it is. You can become a sports agent, represent a sports star, or market for any company that sponsors a sports organization," she added, listing her job options.

Garber decided that if she was going to eventually reach her goal of working for a sports company, she would probably have to start at the bottom and work her way up.

Then, in March 2004, Garber, who has been "dancing all her life," saw an ad in the paper for cheerleading auditions with the Argos.

She figured it would be a great way to get a foot in the door, and much more exciting than finding a human resources job, which she considered at one point.

As a cheerleader, Garber does a lot of promotional work, such as appearing at golf tournaments and dancing on a float in the Caribana parade last month.

She said she is not the only one on the Argo squad with ambitions to break into sports marketing through cheerleading. Many of her teammates, who are generally a few years older than she is, have the same goals and act as her mentors, giving her advice about the steps she should take.

Garber, who has been with the football team for about a year, added that Argo owners Howard Sokolowski and David Cynamon are also "really great, really supportive, and they're always willing to talk to people for us to get us internships."

"I love Toronto and it helps me get up close and personal with the fans. It also lets me get involved with event management and event marketing, and it gives me the opportunity to be out there with the public. I've met a lot of new friends on the team, and also a lot of celebrities."

As part of her obligation to do promotions for the team, Garber has been to celebrity golf tournaments where she has met hockey legend Wayne Gretzky's father, Walter, as well as sports stars and rock bands the Barenaked Ladies and the Tragically Hip.

While she hopes that being part of the team will one day help her get a job with Maple Leaf Sports & Entertainment Ltd., which owns the Toronto Maple Leafs and the Toronto Raptors, she realizes that some people may not take her seriously because she is a cheerleader.

"They think I'm a blond bimbo. That's what I hate about it."

Those who doubt how serious she is about her goals may not know that cheerleading is not the only extra-curricular activity Garber has on her plate.

When all her friends went away for university and she remained in Toronto, Garber was eager to make new friends.

After seeing a flyer for a Jewish sorority event, she got involved with Delta Pi.

By her second year at York, she had become the sorority's social director, responsible for planning events and recruiting new members. This year, she was voted vice-president of her chapter, and one of her many responsibilities is planning an annual auction for breast cancer research.

"I try to get a lot of different companies to help us, and all the proceeds go to charity. We do a lot of charity events."

One of those events is a Valentine's Day party called the Sweetest Sin that draws 400 to 500 people and all profits go to charity.

With all her responsibilities, Garber still finds time to work at JF&CS as a receptionist – the same job she's had since Grade 11.

"I love the organization so much. I love the people there. They're like a second family to me. And [the job] looks really good on my resume."

Garber shows no signs of slowing down in the near future.

"In the next five years, I'd like to be working for Maple Leaf Sports & Entertainment as an event co-ordinator – and be married," she said with a laugh.

"Later, I'd like to open my own sports marketing company."

Israeli Arab 'planting seeds' of understanding

By ANNA MORGAN
Special to The CJN

Hanna Shaheen hopes that when he's ready to retire to his farming village in the Galilee, peace will have arrived in Israel. In the meantime, he is planting seeds to help promote understanding between Israeli Arabs and Jews.

Shaheen recently donated money to Tel Hai College, a university in the Galilee that he believes promotes dialogue and an understanding of the multicultural nature of Israeli society. His donation makes him one of the first Israeli Arabs to have donated to an Israeli educational institution.

In 1979, Shaheen moved to Canada and settled comfortably in Toronto with his wife, Ibtissam. Yet, like many immigrants, he often thinks about his home and youth growing up in a small Christian village of 8,800 people called Mi'ilya, in the northern Israeli countryside about 15 kilometres east of Naharia. He goes back every year to visit his family, sometimes taking his three children, Ramsey, Omar and Kendar, with him. It's important for him that they remember their heritage.

In Israel's early days of statehood, he recalls, most families in his village sent their boys to boarding schools where the spoken language was Arabic. But his parents, who were farmers, barely scraped together bus fare and tuition to send him to the public high school in Naharia. Out of 1,200 students, Shaheen remembers only one other Arab student. Being part of just a few Israeli Arabs in the predominantly Jewish public school was an experience he will never forget.

"In those early days, there was very little contact between Israeli Jewish and Arab kids. And then all of a sudden, I was thrown into this big school… a tiny guy who looks a little bit different and speaks a little bit different. It wasn't easy," Shaheen said in his Toronto office where the engineer now designs, manufactures and markets office furniture.

"In that Naharia high school, I learned everything the Jewish students studied, including Tanach, Talmud, Mishnah and Pirkei Avot. I think I know more about Judaism than 90 per cent of the Jews I meet," Shaheen said with a chuckle.

"That education enriched my knowledge and my background. Some of those families and students in Naharia really opened their arms to me. They used to invite this little guy from the village to their homes. I still have some of them as my friends," he said.

In fact, Shaheen recalls that his math teacher, Mr. Grossman, recognized how frightened he was and mentored him during school breaks. When Grossman was killed in the Yom Kippur War, Shaheen was devastated.

"Going to his funeral was one of the hardest things I ever had to do," he said.

After graduating from high school, Shaheen worked for four years to help his parents before he went on to complete a degree in engineering at the Technion, Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa. While studying there, he once again faced the challenge of being a minority in an educational environment.

The young student was among eight or nine other Arab students at the Technion at the time. "I survived. But there were many who didn't," Shaheen said. That memory is what prompted him to support Tel Hai College.

"Tel Hai seems to recognize that Israeli society is diversified – in culture, religion, food and clothing. They recognize that promoting peaceful coexistence means recognizing the multi-layered nature of the fabric of Israeli society and they take an educated approach to dealing with it."

Today, there are just over one million Israeli Muslim and Christian Arabs living within Israel. Over the years, relations between Israel's Jews and Arabs have been relatively calm. However, conflicts with the Arab world have sometimes led to violent altercations between the two communities within Israel.

When asked about Israel and the discrimination Israeli Arabs claim to face, Shaheen said, "I'm Israeli and I respect my government. I love the State of Israel, but we all make mistakes."

Mississauga MP lashes Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

An independent member of Parliament who was kicked out of the Liberal caucus for her anti-American tirades has levelled a stinging attack against Israel.

In a recent summer mailing to her Mississauga constituents and in a PowerPoint slide show posted on her website, Carolyn Parrish lays the blame for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict squarely on the Jewish state.

Parrish, who is negotiating with senior party officials to return to the Liberal fold after being ousted last year for calling Americans "bastards" and stomping on a doll bearing the likeness of U.S. President George W. Bush, hammers Israel as a brutal occupier that has systematically victimized Palestinians, especially children.

"The occupation of one people by another is the root cause of Israeli-Palestinian violence and the suffering of both peoples," the outspoken MP states on her website, recounting her fourth trip to the area this past April. "That conflict cannot be resolved without significant steps being taken to end the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territories and associated settlement activity."

Parrish accuses Israel of seeking to "colonize" the Jordan Valley and says it "wants to expropriate as much land as possible prior to final status talks with the Palestinian Authority."

Israel has already seized "vast amounts of Bedouin land." She also says Israel's security barrier "de facto annexes 9.5 per cent of the West Bank."

Parrish visited refugee camps in Lebanon, Syria and Jordan, and said she found Palestinians there are generally well-treated.

That's in stark contrast to Palestinians in the West Bank town of Nablus, where Israelis in 2002 "used Apache helicopters and F-16 fighter jets to destroy buildings," and where "officials" reported 180 "direct attacks on ambulances and the killing of six medical workers."

In "The Carolyn Parrish Report," mailed this summer to voters in her Mississauga Erindale riding, the MP recounts her fourth visit to "Palestine."

She refers to the security barrier as "more horrendous" than the Berlin Wall, and that it "completely imprisons" more than 400,000 Palestinians and "enables Israeli control of 46 per cent of the Occupied West Bank.".

One of her "saddest" discoveries, she says, was that access to the Dead Sea "is now barred to Arabs and all other visitors unless they stay at a four or five star luxury Israeli hotel."

The mailing disturbed Mississauga Jewish residents Helen and John Fischer.

In a letter to The CJN, John Fischer, a Holocaust survivor, said he found the report "appalling, one-sided [and] outright anti-Israel, if not anti-Semitic.

"I am very upset and I very much regret that I have voted for [Parrish] in previous elections as a Liberal candidate," he added.

Helen Fischer told The CJN the couple was "outraged" because Parrish's facts "are completely wrong. I've been a Liberal all my life, but this doesn't give me much confidence."

Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Mississauga's Solel Congregation wrote to Parrish, saying that her approach, "it seems to me, is more devoted to levelling criticism and laying blame. If this is so, I think it is reasonable to ask you to look for blame on both sides of the conflict and to present a more fair and balanced approach to your constituents."

Rabbi Englander refuted Parrish's allegations point by point, and said the MP's "inflammatory remarks have caused a rift among Canadian citizens living within your riding. I see no wisdom in bringing to our neighbourhood the prejudices and hatreds of a dispute halfway around the world. Surely this is a disservice to our community, unworthy of a public representative."

In a response to Rabbi Englander sent Aug. 4, Parrish notes that a part of the rabbi's letter "set my teeth on edge, but I soldiered on. It is very condescending to suggest my approach is 'devoted to levelling criticism and laying blame.' While you cheerfully insult me, you also claim to be 'an optimistic person.' So too am I – but not on issues surrounding Palestine and its people.

"I returned from this trip truly dismayed by the stifling presence of the Wall and the overwhelming construction of settlements around Jerusalem. This trip really tested my ability to hope."

Rabbi Englander, Parrish points out, "euphemistically refer[s] to the Wall as a 'security fence.' Would that were so! Good fences make good neighbours, but this fence has been condemned by the highest court in the world."

She goes on to defend her positions on the barrier, the plight of Bedouins and her own policy of discussing Palestinian rights despite the "campaign" by the rabbi and others "to somehow justify your continuing campaign against discussion of the human rights abuses occurring in the occupied territories. You don't like what is being said. You do not want to appear undemocratic. You therefore manufacture dire consequences!"

Ultimately, Parrish concedes that her arguments are not going to sway the rabbi.

"On this instance, further back and forth debate is fruitless. I respect your position in your community, as I hope you do mine. Our positions are essentially irreconcilable."

The Canada-Israel Committee has prepared a 2,900-word rebuttal to Parrish's remarks, calling them mischievous, fallacious and unbalanced.

Ahenakew appeals conviction

Doug Christie, Ahenakew's lawyer, told Canadian Press that appeal documents have been filed and the case could be heard in the spring of 2006.

Christie said he will argue that comments Ahenakew made to a newspaper reporter in 2002, referring to Jews as "a disease" and justifying the Holocaust, were made in private conversation and don't come under the terms of the Criminal Code's anti-hate law.

Christie said Ahenakew didn't know the reporter was tape-recording their conversation, and he was expecting to be interviewed on a different topic and, therefore, didn't expect that his comments on Jews were part of the interview.

The interview came after Ahenakew, 71, addressed a meeting of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations in December 2002. In the speech, Ahenakew claimed Jews had started World War II.

When asked afterwards by a reporter from the Saskatoon StarPhoenix to clarify his remarks. Ahenakew called Jews "a disease" and said, "That's how Hitler came in. He was going to make damn sure the Jews didn't take over Germany and Europe. That's why he fried six million of those guys, you know. Jews would have owned the goddamned world."

Last month, Ahenakew was convicted of promoting hatred of Jews and fined $1,000.

A few days later, he was stripped of his membership in the Order of Canada.

Ahenakew has said he would not appeal his removal from the Order of Canada, but he said he would not give up his pins and medals and that officials would have to take them.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) announced last week that it will seek intervener status in the appeal.

"We are confident that the conviction will be upheld, and we will work with the Crown in this case to ensure that David Ahenakew is held legally responsible for his actions," said CJC national president Ed Morgan.

"An appeal will give the courts a further chance to define and condemn hateful speech," he added.

Journalists should be allowed to report accurately

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Is there anything left to say about CBC's "policy" on using the words "terrorism" and "terrorist" (hereafter referred to as the "T-words")? Apparently so.

In his July 25 Globe and Mail column, "Lessons from London: How not to cover terror attacks," Norman Spector referred to extensive criticism directed at the British Broadcasting Corporation for its coverage of the July 7 London bombings.

Immediately after the tragic events, the BBC used the T-word, especially in its online reports. But in the following days, it altered its own copy to eliminate any trace of the term (using the word "bomber" in place of "terrorist").

Reaction was outspoken. The BBC was charged with censorship and taking political correctness to new depths of absurdity. BBC chair Sir Michael Grade admitted that he disagreed with the edits and would examine the issue closely. He also admitted that the BBC had been describing the perpetrators of the London attacks as "terrorists." The BBC, Spector said, subsequently issued a statement saying that it had not banned the use of the term.

Although Spector did not cite it, the BBC does indeed have a policy on the issue, apparently modified in light of the criticism. In an article titled "Accuracy and Honesty" (The Guardian, July 13), Roger Mosey, BBC's head of television news, clearly stated: "There is no ban. It's true, the word is contentious in some contexts on our international services, hence the recommendation that it be employed with care. But we have used, and will continue to use the words "terror," "terrorism" and "terrorist" – as we did in all our flagship bulletins from [July 7]."

That is, the BBC would continue to use the T-word when appropriate, even if unattributed to a second source. As Mosey put it: "Journalism is a vital part of our national response to terrorism: reporting honestly and accurately what happened, and I believe the BBC did that [during the London attacks] and we will continue to do it."

Spector then turned to the CBC. "Here at home, the CBC… argues that to use the T-word would be to 'take sides.' However, only one side – the side looking to recruit new suicide bombers – has an interest in terminological confusion."

Spector noted that according to a Le Devoir report, CBC's francophone Radio-Canada "refused to go along, choosing to employ the terrorist term, leaving the CBC English-speaking reporters increasingly isolated – in Canada and around the world."

On June 28, Tony Burman, editor-in-chief of CBC News, replied to Spector in a letter to the Globe and Mail. He charged that Spector had misrepresented CBC policy, and explained that the CBC does not ban or avoid using the T-words.

"In fact," he wrote, "our longstanding practice is that we have frequently used these terms in our coverage of the tragedies in London, Madrid, the Middle East, etc., but only when attributed to others, such as public officials or police forces."

This explanation is inaccurate. CBC reporters frequently used the T-word without attribution when describing terrorist attacks in New York, Bali, Madrid and other places (except in Israel). Burman has now written a memo to CBC staff explaining that the T-word should be used only when attributed. (This means that CBC policy will finally be applied uniformly, if absurdly.)

What Burman really means is that CBC reporters will be allowed to attribute the T-words when uttered by others, but cannot use them themselves when describing events.

The point Spector has illuminated – the one that Burman has avoided – is that the BBC, unlike CBC news, allows its reporters to use the T-words directly, without citing the source.

CBC cannot ban the use of the term outright because, as its ombudsman has admitted, the T-words are listed in CBC's guidebook, Journalistic Standards and Practices. The subject of terrorism is even listed in its index! This shows how convoluted CBC's "policy" is.

Certainly the T-words should not be overworked. But when they do apply, as in New York, London, Madrid and Tel Aviv, journalists cannot pretend otherwise. As the BBC and a growing number of news organizations have come to recognize, journalists should be allowed to report with unfettered accuracy.

Shivah protocol: Take your cue from the mourner

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Gloria Clamen sat shivah for her mother 12 years ago, she was very moved by the visit of one of her mother's former customers.

"I had not seen this person since I was a teenager," Clamen recalled. "I loved that she took the risk of coming to a strange house, of maybe not being remembered. It made the experience so much more profound. It's another layer of respect and love."

Since then, the CJN advertising representative, an active volunteer with two grown children and a young grandson, has stopped wondering about the appropriateness of making a shivah visit if she's been out of contact for an extended period of time.

Clamen has sat shivah for both her parents and visited many friends and relatives observing the traditional seven days of mourning following a Jewish funeral. But she still has questions about protocol for shivah visitors.

Even rabbis, however, admit that the answers – those not governed by Jewish law or custom – may vary from one shivah to the next.

The bottom line, according to all the rabbis interviewed for this article, is to take your cue from the mourner.

"The goal of a shivah visit is to meet the needs of the mourners," said Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation. "If they're tired, encourage them to lie down and get some rest. If you come in and they're sleeping, don't ask that they be awakened.

"If they have a need to talk, you should be there to listen, and that may be a longer visit."

Even doing laundry can be appropriate if mourners have young children and there is no one else to do that, Rabbi Scheim noted.

Three years ago, Mara Koven and her two young children, then age 3 and 6, sat shivah together with her in-laws, brother-in-law and sister-in-law after the sudden death of her husband Jonathan at age 39. "Everyone knew [the children] were the priority," she said.

Koven, who subsequently co-edited the book Mourning has Broken – A Collection of Creative Writing about Grief and Healing, set the tone by letting the children know that they would each get at least half an hour of her time every day during the shivah. Also, she said, "their room was theirs. They decided who could go in there. [Kids] need to feel empowered."

Balancing her own grief with the needs of her children, she found it "lifted" her up to hear stories about her husband and learn things about him she hadn't known. But just by visiting a shivah, one is saying, "You matter to me," she said.

Koven found herself touched by observant Jewish visitors who took her hands, looked her in the eyes, and said traditional Hebrew words of comfort as they left.

"[Those people] were there for a reason," said Koven, whose background is Conservative.

She also appreciated that a friend brought her a coffee from Starbucks every morning. "It was her way of giving me a nice little treat, of saying, 'I'm here for you,'" Koven recalls.

Other friends – "I called them my shivah ladies" – would make lunch for her children to take to school. They also co-ordinated play dates for the children, and oversaw the list of meals that people provided during the shivah.

"I had a whole team of friends that just kicked in. I don't have family here, and the Jewish community put us in a really warm hug."

Like many people, Koven found evenings difficult because of the number of visitors. She found mornings were the best time to have a meaningful conversation, if people were able to come then.

Photos can spark conversation if it's hard to talk about the person who died, she noted.

Still, sometimes exhaustion set in, Koven recalls. "If we wanted a few hours alone, we would leave out a pad of paper on the steps, and people would jot down their thoughts. That was an amazing thing. That was really helpful."

A team of friends "just kicked in" for Mara Koven, centre, and her children Maya and Noah when her husband died three years ago. [Frances Kraft photo]

One of the comments Koven found beneficial was, "Time will be your friend."

But support is still welcome – and needed – once shivah is over. A woman Koven called her "lifeline" told her she would call "every night until you tell me not to."

Koven's father called long-distance every night for months to read from the classic Hardy Boys series before his grandson went to bed, and her mother-in-law gave them e-mails she had saved that were written by Koven's husband about the children. "I think it's just important to reach out."

Rick, a Torontonian whose father died last year, said he's bothered by a "party atmosphere" at some shivah houses. He requested that his name not be used so that friends and family wouldn't think he was being critical of them.

Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Solel Congregation in Mississauga advises mourners to enlist close friends and relatives to avert such situations. They can request, for example, that everyone take part in services.

Rick, in fact, enlisted the help of a friend to request that visitors socializing near the mourners move to a different area of the house.

At a recent shivah – newly sensitized – he ran into an old friend he hadn't seen in years, and quietly suggested that they catch up elsewhere.

"People mean well," said Rick. "But they just don't understand the depth of what the mourners are going through. I think people forget that it's a place of mourning and remembrance."

The fact that his father's death was expected did not mitigate his grief, he said, although others note that when a death is preceded by a lengthy illness, some mourning has already taken place.

Rick also recommended that visitors express their condolences to all the mourners, introducing themselves to those they don't know. He recalls one afternoon when he and another mourner were sitting together and a visitor began a conversation with the other person. "It was like I wasn't even there," said Rick.

In addition, he appreciated when visitors limited the time they spent with him when others were waiting to express their sympathy.

According to the Talmud, visitors are not supposed to speak until the mourner starts to speak, said Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah.

A less literal interpretation might be, "I [the visitor] am here to talk about what you [as a mourner] want to talk about, even if it's nothing at all," according to Rabbi Tradburks.

Discussions with the mourners should revolve around the person who passed away, in accordance with Jewish tradition, Rick believes.

What often happens, though, is that people assume the mourners do not want to talk about the death, said Rabbi Tradburks.

"It's important to allow the aveilim [mourners] to lead the topics of conversation," said Rabbi Amram Assayag of the Sephardic Kehila Centre. "Each one is different… and there are times, even on the same day, that they don't want to speak about the same things, so they themselves change the conversation.

"We tell people to be careful not to have any idle talk that is not within the spirit of the shivah."

On the other hand, sometimes visitors find that mourners want to know what's happening in the world, said Rabbi Scheim. "You have to take the cue from them."

The most comforting thing is to talk about the kind of person the deceased was, he said. Even laughter isn't necessarily inappropriate. "A lot of memories are funny," said Rabbi Scheim. "The bottom line is what is comforting to the mourner.

"You never question any decision [mourners have] made," stressed Rabbi Scheim, referring in large part to health-care choices prior to the death. "You don't want to cause them pain because you're curious, or criticize their decisions."

A criticism Jewish mourners often hear is that they're not supposed to thank people for coming. Mourners have no social responsibilities, explained Rabbi Scheim. "But [they're] not committing a sin by saying thank you."

Clamen said that when someone thanks her, she usually says, "I'm glad I could be of comfort."

Rabbi Assayag notes that at Sephardi shivahs, it is more common to express emotion freely.

"In a very quiet and noble way you could sit with the family and get quite emotional with whatever you have to tell them. Part of the idea is to allow them to grieve. It's easier for them when they don't have to watch what they're doing when there are people around."

Also, he noted, in many Sephardi shivah houses, visitors are offered fruit and asked to make a blessing over it before eating. "It's not something you decline," he said, explaining that the blessing over the food is "for the merit of the neshamah [soul]" of the person who has died.

"It's not a meal," he said. "It's symbolic."

Mealtimes at a shivah provide an opportunity for the mourners to have a quiet break together and unwind, said Rick.

Those who want to provide a meal should put their name on a list early in the week.

"People should know not to visit during meals, unless they are very close and are helping to serve the meal," said Rabbi Englander.

Breakfast after the morning minyan is an exception. Because many people go straight to work from a shivah minyan, it's considered "a courtesy" to offer a simple breakfast, said Rabbi Scheim.

Rabbi Tradburks has found that in some communities people assume that shivah visits mean participating in the minyan. "[But] that's not the sum total of comfort." Sometimes, he said, there's nobody there the rest of the day.

"If you know the person well, go early, go often and stay as long as you can if your presence is needed," said Rabbi Englander. "I think the idea of being surrounded by people who matter most to you and having that sense of community is very therapeutic."

Dos and don'ts for shivah visitors

More than anything else, a shivah visit is supposed to address the needs of the mourners. Below are some dos and don'ts suggested by rabbis and others, based on their personal experience.

- Do take your cue from the mourners regarding the topic of conversation and how much they feel like talking.
- If you are going for prayer services, arrive on time. Men should bring a tallit and tfillin for traditional morning services.
- Don't arrive too early in the morning, or stay too late at night. Don't arrive at meal times, unless you are helping to serve a meal and clean up. This may be the only time mourners have with each other, without visitors.
- If you run into other visitors you know, limit your small talk in front of the mourners. It's better to catch up in another room or after the shivah visit.
- As a rule, unless you are a close friend or family member of the mourners, shivah visits should be fairly short.
- Do offer to help if you are staying longer, even if it's just to bring a cup of coffee to the mourners.
- Do not join the family at the table unless you are invited.
- Offer your condolences to all the mourners who are nearby.
- Remember that mourners often find it comforting to hear stories about the person who has died.
- If you are providing a meal, be sensitive to kashrut needs, and also keep in mind that Sephardi mourners do not eat meat during the shivah week.
- Donations to charities that were specified by the mourners are appreciated, as are personal notes.
- Call when shivah is over. Another visit may be welcome, particularly if a mourner is older or doesn't feel like going out.
- For information about halachic aspects of shivah and shivah visits, consult a book such as To Comfort the Bereaved, by Rabbi Aaron Levine, or The Jewish Way in Death and Mourning, by Rabbi Maurice Lamm.

Netanyahu's resignation creates havoc

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has thrown Israeli politics into disarray with an 11th-hour resignation in protest at the upcoming Gaza Strip withdrawal.

After long denying pundits' speculation that his days alongside Prime Minister Ariel Sharon were numbered, Netanyahu tendered his resignation Sunday, just as the cabinet approved the first phase of settlement evacuations, which are slated to begin next week.

"I am all torn up inside," Netanyahu told reporters. "Like anyone, I aspire to leave Gaza. I aspire to peace," he said. "But the disengagement plan endangers Israel and is polarizing its people."

Sharon had no immediate comment on the surprise move by his top Likud Party rival, which was hailed as a heroic act of conscience by many Israelis who see the unilateral withdrawals from Gaza and the northern West Bank as a recipe for renewed Palestinian terrorism.

But on the left, Netanyahu was accused of cynically staking out a claim on a second term as prime minister at the cost of government stability. Labor Party ministers were quick to recall how he handed over most of the West Bank city of Hebron to the Palestinian Authority while he was prime minister in 1997, despite having earlier lambasted the land-for-peace principle before he headed the government.

Benjamin Netanyahu

"Netanyahu is, once again, coming out as a schemer at a historic juncture, preferring his own interests over those of the nation's," Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said.

Barring copycat resignations by other Likud ministers who have voiced misgivings about the Gaza plan, Sharon's most important policy is expected to stay on track.

Sharon wasted no time in naming Trade Minister Ehud Olmert to be Netanyahu's interim replacement.

But all agreed that, in today's global economy, Netanyahu's shoes as finance minister would be hard to fill.

During 2½ years at the Treasury, he made a major impact with belt-tightening reforms that many economists credited with pulling the Jewish state out of recession.

The Israeli markets panicked at Netanyahu's resignation, which came an hour before trading ended. The MAOF Index plummeted 5.25 per cent, and there were similar drops across the board.

Netanyahu appealed for calm, extolling the skills of his finance ministry aides and recommending that his successor keep them on.

"He will receive an economy that has gone from collapse to growth," Netanyahu said. "As long as the same course is maintained at the helm, this trend should continue."

According to media reports, Netanyahu's decision to quit the government was so quick as to have caught his closest advisers off-guard. Some political analysts suggested that, with the removal of 25 Jewish settlements to formally begin on Aug. 15, Netanyahu seeks to inherit as the next prime minister an Israel devoid of the security burden of Gaza, while remaining unassociated with its evacuation.

The walkout could help restore Netanyahu's credibility among hard-line supporters.

Just last week, one of his long-standing foreign funders, the Australian diamond billionaire Joseph Gutnick, said in an Israeli-television interview that Netanyahu had disappointed many of those who voted for him as prime minister in 1996.

In his remarks to reporters, Netanyahu did not detail his political aspirations, saying only that he did not want to be remembered as having taken part in a withdrawal that could turn Gaza into a "base for Islamic terror."

"You know, I'm the son of a historian," he said. "In 10, 50, 100 years, I want them to be able to say, 'He did not take part in it.'"

Disengagement by the numbers

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — In addition to the human dimensions, this summer's disengagement plan can be measured by the numbers:

- 100 – per cent of the Gaza Strip to be evacuated and handed over to the Palestinian Authority;
- 300 – square miles of the West Bank to be evacuated;
- 21 – Israeli settlements to be uprooted in the Gaza Strip;
- 4 – Israeli settlements to be uprooted in the West Bank;
- 9,000 – approximate number of Israelis to be evacuated;
- 45,000 – Israeli soldiers and police expected to participate in the Gaza withdrawal;
- $1.74 billion – approximate cost of the withdrawal to the Israeli government;
- $360,000 – average compensation the Israeli government expects to pay each relocated family;
- $870 million – approximate cost to resettle former West Bank and Gaza residents elsewhere in the country; and
- $2.2 billion – amount of special assistance Israel plans to request from the United States.

Congress condemns death curse

Morgan and Rabbi Bulka said that lively debate about Israel's planned disengagement from Gaza, set to begin on Aug. 17, is natural, but that the position adopted by Dayan and his cohorts falls "outside the boundary of all acceptable debate."

In an interview, Morgan, a law professor at the University of Toronto, declared: "It's important for the Jewish community's leadership, and especially its religious leaders, to condemn violent extremism expressed in the name of religion."

Alluding to Muslim radicalism, he noted, "That phenomenon seems to be an epidemic plaguing many religions today."

Rabbi Bulka, in an interview, said Rabin's murder was "a black mark on Jewish history."

Jewish leaders in Canada should work against a climate that encourages the resolution of political disputes through violence, said the spiritual leader of Machzikei Hadas, an Orthodox synagogue in Ottawa.

"We can't let this happen again.

"We hope our message gets across to the rabbinate and ripples back to Israel. This is not the Jewish way, and is simply out of bounds. This is not the Jewish way."

POSITION AVAILABLE

Rabbi

Ohel Leah Synagogue
Hong Kong

Ohel Leah Synagogue is a Modern Orthodox Synagogue which serves a diverse Jewish community in Hong Kong.

The beautiful synagogue building which dates from 1902 is in a residential neighbourhood and is part of a complex that includes a mikveh, Jewish Community Centre (with kosher grocery and restaurants) and Jewish day school.

The Ohel Leah Rabbi should provide dynamic leadership to the congregation composed of approximately 200 families and single adults from all over the world and who have a variety of intellectual, religious and professional backgrounds. This makes Hong Kong an exciting and dynamic place for anyone who would wish to explore this opportunity.

The ideal candidate should be able to develop the community to its full potential through active participation in services, community activities and education programmes.

The successful candidate should have a centrist philosophy and pluralistic approach to Modern Orthodoxy. He should demonstrate leadership skills in rendering Halachic decisions and in motivating adults and children, and should have significant pastoral experience. A university degree is preferred but not required. Fluent English and excellent public-speaking skills are essential.

The successful candidate will receive an attractive salary, housing and other benefits.

Sharon faces many challenges

In the Israeli view, the key to future progress lies in the emergence of a credible Palestinian peace partner. Israel's post-withdrawal strategy, therefore, will be to urge the international community to focus on creating a Palestinian leadership strong enough to run Gaza, prevent terror and conduct meaningful peace negotiations with Israel.

The best way to do this, the Israelis say, is to boost the Palestinian economy.

Instead of rushing into an ill-timed peace conference, the international community should turn its energy to raising funds for investment in Gaza, Israeli officials argue. Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev told JTA that Israel is fully supportive of the efforts by former World Bank president James Wolfensohn to put together an international investment package and of the pledge by the world's richest nations at the recent G-8 conference in Scotland to raise $3 billion a year for Gaza for each of the next three years.

"It is in our interest that Gaza be a success story," Regev says, "because if there is a 'disengagement dividend' and ordinary Gazans feel tangible economic benefits after our withdrawal, that could help create the climate for the emergence of a genuine peace partner for Israel."

For Israel, Regev says, "partner" is the key word. "If we see that we have a partner, we will need no conferences or prodding to move ahead."

But there is a dilemma for Israel: how to enable Palestinian Authority (PA) forces to become strong enough to exercise control over Gaza without constituting a security threat to Israel itself?

In her recent visit to the area, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was adamant about supplying the Palestinian Authority with armoured personnel carriers and light weapons to keep the peace or win a possible showdown with terrorist groups such as Hamas.

Israel, however, wants strict controls on the Palestinian buildup, fearing that the guns could be turned on Jerusalem or Tel Aviv – or used to carry out terrorist attacks, given the PA security forces' deep involvement in terrorism during the intifadah. Since he took office in January, one of PA President Mahmoud Abbas' main strategies for dealing with terrorist groups has been to offer their members uniforms in the official PA forces.

On the Palestinian front, the Israelis see two scenarios: Gaza succeeding and becoming the basis for negotiations over Palestinian statehood or Gaza failing and becoming part of a new intifadah against Israel, focused mainly on the West Bank.

In the first case, Regev says, Israel will be ready for further withdrawals; in the latter, the international community will understand why Israel cannot be expected to hand over more land.

Regev says Israel will seek international endorsement for the fact that it has withdrawn fully from Gaza, just as it did after its May 2000 withdrawal from southern Lebanon. That would deny the Palestinians any pretext for continuing to wage war from Gaza.

On the domestic front, the big question is Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's future in the Likud party, where he can't count on a majority in key institutions such as the party's central committee or Knesset faction.

Even if Sharon were to beat off a leadership challenge from Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, he would be unlikely to enter the next Knesset with a more supportive faction.

The answer for Sharon could be to engineer what is often referred to as the "big bang" of Israeli politics, in which the Likud's more moderate wing joins with the Shinui party and moderate parts of the Labor party to form a strong centrist alliance, with Sharon at its head.

Sharon denies that he has anything like this in mind. But shrewd observers of the Israeli political scene point out that he did nothing to bring back ex-Likudniks during a recent party-membership drive. Since the party leader is elected in a primary that is open to all Likud members, these observers conclude that Sharon has already decided not to run against Netanyahu within the Likud and instead to find a leadership spot for himself outside the party.

Either way, politicians and pundits predict early elections in the first half of 2006, and the key issue will be Israel's next move after the Gaza withdrawal.

Hawks such as Netanyahu will advocate digging in behind the new lines. Sharon's people will say it depends on what happens in Gaza. Labour leaders will push for further withdrawals from the West Bank. And further to the left, the Yachad leader Yossi Beilin will revive the so-called Geneva initiative as a model for a final peace deal with the Palestinians.

The domestic debate in Israel could influence moves by the international community: whether the call is to proceed step-by-step according to the internationally approved "road map" peace plan; to attempt a major leap based on something like the Geneva initiative, which points to possible solutions on core issues like borders, Jerusalem and refugees; or to leave the way open for more unilateral moves by Israel.

But the most pressing issue on Israel's domestic agenda after the withdrawal is likely to be the rift between national religious Jews and the state. Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the spiritual father of religious Zionism, saw the state as the beginning of redemption, a necessary step leading toward the coming of the Messiah.

Pullout shakes roots of Zionism

Last week we published an article by Uri Dromi arguing in favour of the disengagement from Gaza. This week we publish the opposite view.

By ASHER KEREN

Opinion

The Jewish people of Kedumim in the West Bank are in the grasp of a powerful catalyst called the disengagement plan, which envisions the unilateral withdrawal from Israel's settlements in the Gaza Strip and parts of Samaria.

Whatever the result of the plan, Israelis must come to grips with its implications on Judaism, Zionism and even democracy. Disengagement forces upon us decisions that can no longer be postponed and the effects of which will be present for decades.

For many, including myself, the anti-disengagement protest last month at Kfar Maimon was the first real statement regarding these issues. There was a sense of unity that is impossible to describe in words, a sense of harmony and purpose that came from within each of the tens of thousands of people who attended. What I witnessed gives me hope and even confidence for a reaffirmation of the Jewish roots of the State of Israel.

If disengagement happens, it will be the first step in the endeavor to empty the rest of Judea and Samaria, including half of Jerusalem, of its Jewish presence. The sociological and political ramifications of this attempt already are shaking the foundations of the Jewish return to Israel. Whatever happens will produce an earthquake.

The danger of disengagement is so great precisely because it has nothing to do with peace. Peace will not come because of disengagement, nor will terrorism cease. Quite the contrary, disengagement is the greatest reward that Palestinian terrorists could have hoped for, and it will further whet their appetite. Everybody knows this, from the supporters of the plan to its most vociferous opponents.

Rather, the disengagement is the changing of the guard: the tired and morally bankrupt secular elite is trying to halt the growing and ideologically charged religious settler movement.

To those who support disengagement, the excuse given is that leaving the Gaza Strip and northern Samaria behind means taking Jewish soldiers and citizens out of the heart of a hostile Arab populace. The deeper truth is that it's a declaration of divorce from the Jewish settlers. Economic wealth and corrupted values are the sole interests today, and that is the true motivation for disengagement.

To those who oppose disengagement, uprooting thousand of Jews from their homes signals the loss of Jewish claims over all parts of the Land of Israel. It is a painful recognition that the ruling minority wishes to crush the remnants of early Zionism and Jewish revival in the Land of Israel.

Disengagement can really be described as a cultural civil war. It is a symptom rather then an imagined cure, the catalyst that will bring deeper processes occurring in Israel today to the forefront of national redefinition.

Secular Jewry is slowly abandoning the most rudimentary vestiges of Judaism and political Zionism, while religious Jewry is becoming more and more fundamentalist and suspicious of the secular state, from the court system to the media and government.

In fact, the disengagement plan is the expression of an exhausted and ideologically bereft left-wing populace no longer willing to come to terms with a hostile external reality. By willingly sacrificing what many see as their "problematic" and "fanatical" Jewish brethren, they are pleading for recognition by the world of their non-Jewish tendencies. It is an excuse for moral breakdown and ideological surrender. The settlers bring to the surface that old Jewish malady of exhaustion, corruption and fear of the gentile expressed through anger toward those who are "too aggressively Jewish."

The chiefly religious settler movement is saying that even if hard and costly, it's a divine right and privilege to reassert our Jewish presence in all parts of the Land of Israel. Their view may be termed biblical Zionism, which means a much bolder and primal Jewish response to the world than has existed since Zionism took root and, really, since the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE.

The issues have been delineated: how is the Zionist claim diminished or strengthened by disengagement? What is Jewish or even Zionist about secular post-Zionism? How is religious Jewry to relate to the state after it uproots thousands of predominantly religious settlers? What is the cost to Israeli democracy of a plan that goes against the government's mandate, especially in light of the prime minister's refusal to conduct a national referendum? Is the State of Israel primarily a secular democracy or a Jewish state with Jewish values ensconced in its institutions? What is the impression on Diaspora Jewry of the current cultural war in Israel?

Disengagement may happen, but it is without seed. It cannot produce an ideological framework for the left because in truth it is ultimately no more then an excuse for corruption. Jewish businessmen, including those with contacts at the highest levels of the Sharon government, want to open a casino where today a settlement stands. It is an attempt by the exhausted and empty secular elite to try to bring peace through capitulation and economy through corruption. In the long run, it will fail.

At Kfar Maimon, the proper response was provided. There can be no stopping the Jewish resurgence. This understanding is not solely cerebral: at Kfar Maimon the tents of Israel were firmly rooted in the ground of the Land of Israel. It is something that is felt from within; a truth that can only spread to all corners of the Jewish world.

Asher Keren has lived in Samaria since 1993. His book, A Time For Change (Gefen Publishing), will be published soon.

Suicide threatened

Some settler youths are reportedly considering mass suicide to protest the upcoming Gaza withdrawal. Ha'aretz reported that 10 to 12 youths from Gaza settlements, all of them surfers, have discussed drowning themselves at sea after the evacuations begin later this month. A Yesha official said the Ha'aretz report was being investigated.

Mofaz updates Abdullah

Israel must proceed with the peace plan for an independent Palestinian state after its withdrawal from Gaza later this month, the Jordanian king stressed in a meeting with Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, according to a Royal Palace statement. King Abdullah II met Mofaz in the Red Sea resort of Aqaba, where they discussed Israel's plans for the disengagement. It was Mofaz's first visit to Jordan as defence minister. The statement said Mofaz told the king: "Israel is committed to carrying out the withdrawal within the framework it has devised."

Palestinian rocket kills Palestinian boy

A Palestinian rocket fired at Israeli settlers protesting the upcoming Gaza withdrawal killed a Palestinian boy. Nine other Palestinians were wounded when the rocket fell in Gaza instead of hitting the Israeli town Sderot, where anti-withdrawal protesters were rallying. Some local Palestinians called on the Palestinian Authority to take measures to stop the attacks.

Israel not so calm after all

Israel's internal security service said the ceasefire declared by Palestinian terrorists has been flouted regularly. According to a Shin Bet report published last week, 33 Israelis have died in Palestinian attacks in the first half of the year, most after the accord was declared Jan. 22. Another 286 Israelis were wounded in the period. The Shin Bet said it had foiled several Palestinian plots to carry out suicide bombings and kidnap Israeli soldiers. Islamic Jihad, which was not part of the agreement, has carried out most attacks in recent months, prompting Israel to resume its policy of "targeted killings" of the group's leaders.

Calm in Mauritania

Israel's ambassador to Mauritania said all is well despite a military coup there. "The embassy is open and operating, but we are staying inside the embassy. We are avoiding going out," Boaz Bismuth told Israel's Yediot/Ynet news site in an interview from Nouakchott, where troops staged a coup last week while the president, Maaouya Ould Sid'Ahmed Taya, was attending the funeral of Saudi King Fahd. Taya has been heavily criticized in Mauritania for opening diplomatic relations with Israel six years ago.

Aussies fire Israeli missile

The Australian air force test fired an Israeli-made missile. Israel's Rafael arms manufacturer said last week that an Australian warplane had carried out two firing trials of its AGM-142E air-to-ground missile and was expected to incorporate it in operational missions. The missile, known by its code name Popeye, is already being used by the air forces of Israel, the United States, Turkey and South Korea.

Record poverty levels

In 2004, an all-time high of 1.534 million Israelis lived below the poverty line, according to a National Insurance Institution (NII) poverty report released Monday. The figure attests to a substantial rise in poverty rates, with 100,000 more poor Israelis in 2004 than in 2003. The report also shows that the number of poor families make up 20.3 per cent of Israel's population. The number of children living in poor families has reached 700,000. Cutbacks in child and income allowances over the last two years by Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who resigned Sunday to protest the upcoming Gaza pullout, are being blamed for the increases.

After Shfaram, analysts wonder about Gaza

By LESLIE SUSSER

Analysis

Israeli security officials long have warned that as the Gaza withdrawal approached, a Jewish extremist might try to stage a spectacular attack, shocking the nation and leading the government to call off the evacuation plan.

Primarily, they were braced for an assassination attempt on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon or an attack on army and police units called in to empty Gaza settlements. But after an AWOL Israeli soldier went berserk last Thursday, opening fire and killing four Israeli Arabs on a bus in the Galilee town Shfaram – raising the prospect of Arab riots or revenge attacks on Jews – pundits are asking what effect, if any, the attack will have on the withdrawal, which is scheduled to begin in mid-August.

The soldier, a 19-year-old army deserter named Eden Natan Zada, who also used the name Tzuberi, boarded a bus bound for Shfaram, an Israeli Arab town in northern Israel on the main road between Haifa and Nazareth. As the bus pulled into Shfaram, Zada sprang to his feet and sprayed automatic fire in all directions, killing four people and wounding about a dozen.

According to one account, people in the bus overpowered and killed Zada as he tried to change magazines in his gun. Another version has an incensed mob storming the bus and lynching the soldier after police had disarmed him.

The terror attack occurred as large contingents of police were in the south of the country to prevent demonstrations against the Gaza withdrawal from getting out of hand. Many of the police were flown by helicopter to Shfaram to reinforce units already at the scene.

They arrived to find the bus surrounded by a mob that refused to allow Zada's corpse to be removed or the bus to be towed away. The police's immediate task was to prevent the crowd from becoming unruly or moving on to Jewish towns to wreak vengeance; they also wanted to remove the bus and the soldier's body. Police Chief Moshe Karadi took personal charge of the operation.

Israeli Arab political leaders also rushed to the scene. Some blamed the army and the Shin Bet security service for failing to pre-empt the outrage. One leader, Issam Makhoul of the Communist Hadash Party, declared that Israeli Arabs would know how to protect their honour and dignity, which some Israeli pundits saw as a veiled threat.

Israeli Arabs' relations with the state are volatile, with a number of major clashes leaving deep scars. In May 1976, six Israeli Arabs were killed during demonstrations against land expropriation on what came to be known as "Land Day."

In autumn 2000, at the start of the Palestinian intifadah, 12 Israeli Arabs were killed in clashes with police during riots in the Galilee.

Those were defining moments in Israeli Arab attitudes toward the state and Israeli Jews' attitudes toward the Arab minority, fuelling mutual suspicions. But the lesson of those bitter experiences could lead Arab leaders to steer a more moderate course this time.

The act that the soldier's shooting spree most resembles is the February 1994 killing of 29 Muslim worshippers in a Hebron mosque by Baruch Goldstein, a fanatic from the nearby settlement of Kiryat Arba.

Like Goldstein, Zada is associated with an extremist West Bank settlement, Tapuah, where he had lived for the past few months. Also like Goldstein, he is said to have been an activist in the anti-Arab Kach movement, which has been officially banned as racist.

Zada's action raises several questions: Will it lead to acts of vengeance or clashes between Israeli Arabs and police? Most analysts don't believe Zada's killing spree will spark violence in the Palestinian territories. The Palestinian leadership wants to see Israel's Gaza withdrawal go through, and it wouldn't want a new wave of Arab terrorism to get in the way.

Nevertheless, rogue groups could open fire, citing the Shfaram killings as the reason. Indeed, on Sunday, the Al-Aksa Brigade said a shooting attack in the West Bank in which a 10-year-old Israeli boy was critically wounded came in response to Zada's attack.

Will settler protesters in the south exploit the redeployment of police to the north to burst into the Gush Katif settlement bloc, which the large police contingent had prevented them from reaching? That, too, appears unlikely, since the protesters wouldn't want it to appear as if they had anything to do with Zada's actions.

But a small number of Israelis appear to have no such reservations.

Amid shouts of support from the 100 or so people in attendance, Zada was buried Sunday in Rishon le-Zion. Local residents, fearing his grave could become a shrine for Jewish extremists, had originally balked at allowing him to be buried in the town. The ceremony took place only after Rishon's mayor, Meir Nitzan, was convinced to hold the burial there.

The most serious question, though, is whether the soldier acted alone or was part of a wider extremist group planning further violent acts in a last-gasp attempt to subvert the withdrawal. If anyone knows at this point, they're not saying. The Yesha settler council denounced the attack, as did Sharon and Israeli politicians from across the political spectrum.

There are other disturbing questions. For example, why wasn't Zada picked up by the army or the Shin Bet? If Zada's attack was an isolated incident that he hoped would ignite a fire across Israel and in the Palestinian areas, stopping the withdrawal, it probably will fail. At every opportunity, Sharon emphasizes his determination to stick to the withdrawal timetable.

But if last week's attack is the beginning of a new wave of Jewish terrorism, there could be serious trouble ahead.

Seniors' jubilee offers great exposure for ageless talent

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

The RBC Seniors' Jubilee, a variety show that showcases the talents of 1,300 performers in their 50s and beyond, will continue to send the message that talent is ageless.

"These are senior people, not youngsters," said Renee Barda, an opera-singing performer in the jubilee, which will include three hours of singing, dancing, comedy and cabaret.

The stage show begins at 1 p.m., but the audience can be entertained in the lobby from 11 a.m. by bands, choirs, magicians and buskers – performers come from 75 Ontario communities – while they wait for the stage show to begin.

"I've never done anything like this before," said Barda, who made her debut concert just last March at Hart House on the University of Toronto campus.

Renee Barda

More than 30 years ago, Barda, born and raised in Toronto, met the man of her dreams, Dino Barda, an Italian aristocrat who was visiting the country.

She said that her husband's father, who had been knighted by the Italian king before World War II, pushed her to give up her dream if she was to marry his son and raise a traditional, Jewish family.

Choosing love, she did just that, gave birth to three boys and never looked back.

Five years ago, her husband, who had suffered from many illnesses throughout his short life, died.

After being encouraged by her three sons to take up her passion once more, Barda released a CD titled Posterity: Timeless World Music two years ago, dedicated to her late husband.

Since then, she has been making strides in turning her dream into reality by sharing her gift with the world.

"The exposure is fantastic. I want to get into the mainstream," said Barda, who insists that her performances are much more personal than other concerts because she talks to her audience in between songs.

"I want to get out of the community. It's my big chance out there."

The auditions for this year's jubilee ran from April to May and Barda said that Wayne Burnett and Glenda Richards, the creators and producers of the jubilee, auditioned more seniors than they ever have in the 17 years since the show began.

This is very encouraging considering the skepticism that the producers faced years ago when they came up with the idea for the show and the Canadian Organization of Senior Artists and Performers.

According to the COSAP website, the mission of this organization is to illustrate to a society that worships youth that "talent is ageless."

Since it began in 1989, the jubilee has become the largest seniors' performance of its kind in North America.

"This is a good venue for me because of the generation," Barda said, referring to the audience at the jubilee as "perky seniors."

The show will run from August 15 to 19 at Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto, but Barda will only be performing on the 15th and the 17th.

She said that the producers don't want to repeat the same show five times because they anticipate many of the audience members will see more than one show. "He wants to spread [the talent] out," Barda said.

Over the two days that she performs, Barda estimates that 7,000 people will hear her sing.

"The name of the game is to get as much exposure as possible," she said.

"Hopefully, people will hear me and they'll want to use me for corporate events."

This classical mezzo soprano sings in six languages – English, Hebrew, Yiddish, Italian, Spanish and French, but said people shouldn't assume that she's just a one-trick pony.

"It's not just a classical repertoire. I do broadway songs as well."

Aside from her goal of doing whatever it takes to get her voice out there, Barda said she has another purpose.

"I feel I have a mission in life," said Barda. "[I want] to get my story across. I was out of something that I loved for so many years. My message is don't be afraid to take that chance and be positive."

Sasson magazine fills a 'stark' void

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Brian Wein and Reva Kaiser have set out to fill a "stark" void in the wedding market.

The husband and wife team are publishers of Sasson Magazine: The Complete Jewish Wedding and Celebration Sourcebook, a 260-page glossy magazine that came out in January.

Wein, a native of New York City, said that although every niche market has a magazine, the couple, both 29, parents of a 2½-year-old son, realized that there was no Jewish wedding or bar mitzvah magazine.

"People in the wedding industry needed a magazine that would provide a forum on the meaning of a Jewish wedding or bar mitzvah," he said.

"We saw a need for a publication that could speak to an audience who is intelligent, well educated and accomplished. Our research told us that the time was right to provide [the Toronto Jewish community] with information specifically targeted to its needs.

"We wanted to bring people together through the relevance of the topic," he said.

They chose the name Sasson, said Wein, because "it is ancient Hebrew for the 'unique degree of joy one experiences when feeling complete and fulfilled.' That is an appropriate name for a wedding magazine."

In addition to providing tips, guides, resources and directories, Sasson includes articles on health, art, politics, social issues and relationships.

In the premiere edition, some 55 contributors wrote articles about such subjects as genetic diseases and compatibility, a history of Jewish wedding customs, a history of klezmer music, recognizing what your bar/bat mitzvah child is experiencing, and several articles on financial management.

"We've had tremendous feedback," said Kaiser. "People have shared articles with their children, and they've said that they have learned things about their heritage. We've even heard from non-Jews who have read our magazine.

"Sasson is about a lot more than planning a wedding or bar mitzvah. It covers that, but it also focuses on the celebration from an intrinsic Jewish level. It has a link to history. [Interestingly], half of our readers are not planning a celebration. People are thirsty for meaningful content."

Putting out the magazine from the time of its conception took seven months "of working around the clock," said Wein.

"It is an ideal situation. I'm the creative one, and Reva makes things happen; she is the rational voice."

The magazine is "kind of like" a second child, said Kaiser. "It takes a tremendous amount of work, but millions of women [work hard] and raise a family. You have to be organized and manage your time well. It is a challenge to separate both lives, but we are empowering each other to reach our potential."

Wein says they are well into planning their second edition. "We aim to surpass what we did last year. The subject is so rich and diverse that we can keep putting out stories."

They also plan editions in California and Montreal, and they are in the early stages of starting up in New York.

The couple has added a charitable component to their work by donating five per cent of their profits to a charity that assists brides. "We want to feel like we're making a difference," Wein says.

Sasson is in retail outlets across the GTA.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II: THE ORIGIN OF "REBECCA" IN IVANHOE

Scottish novelist Walter Scott's portraits of the Jew Isaac of York and his daughter Rebecca in his medieval romance Ivanhoe (1819) provides English literature with its strongest positive counterbalance to the stereotypical conception of the Jew as a dark misanthropic being such as Shakespeare's Shylock.

The author William Thackeray, who read Ivanhoe as a child, considered Rebecca "the sweetest character in the whole range of fiction," and published a fantastical sequel, Rebecca and Rowena (1850), in which she and not the "icy, faultless, prim" Rowena marries the knightly hero Ivanhoe.

A century later, Elizabeth Taylor gave a memorable portrayal of Rebecca in the popular screen version of the classic adventure tale.

As a fair, kindhearted and eloquent daughter of Israel, Rebecca shines as a model of "true Jewish womanhood, faithful in the defence of her people, her religion and her honour," writes Montagu Frank Modder in The Jew in the Literature of England. Rebecca "endures the hardships of her lot with calm resignation and extraordinary religious faith," Modder notes. "As she moves through the story, we admire her dark beauty of raven hair and flashing eye, her modesty, dignity and courage."

Scott, like Shakespeare, may not have known any Jews except through legend or hearsay. It was a German friend of his wife's who suggested that some Jewish characters would lend atmosphere to one of his plots. But it was the American writer Washington Irving who, during a visit to Scott in Scotland in 1817, specifically inspired the character of Rebecca by telling him about his lovely and charming friend, Rebecca Gratz of Philadelphia.

Seeing that the author of the Waverley novels was intrigued, Irving gave a full description. Rebecca, he said, was the beautiful unmarried daughter of a prominent deceased merchant. Besides running her family's large household, she helped the poor, visited the sick and performed many other charitable deeds; she also ran a school for Jewish children. Those close to her knew that she had been in love with a Gentile man but had sacrificed the romance out of loyalty to her faith. (Irving, too, had lost a young love; his fiancée Matilda Hoffman had died at 18 and had been Rebecca's best friend. He had been a frequent guest to the Gratz mansion, so much so that a room had been named in his honour.)

"I will make something of your Rebecca yet," Scott reportedly told Irving. Two years later, Scott mailed him a freshly minted copy of Ivanhoe with a note: "How do you like your Rebecca? Does the Rebecca I have pictured here compare well with the pattern given?"

Rebecca of Philadelphia must have been immensely flattered by the portrait in Ivanhoe but preferred out of modesty to avoid discussing the connection between herself and Rebecca of York. However, one Saturday in synagogue a prominent visitor asked her, "Is it true, Miss Gratz, that you are the Rebecca of Ivanhoe?" Seeing no way to avoid answering, the stately figure gently smiled and said, "They say so, my dear."

When her sister Rachel died, Rebecca took in her six children and delighted in becoming a second mother to them. She was also a soothing and comforting presence in countless sick rooms, including her grandfather's. Day after day she sat with him, nursed him, read to him; now, as the end drew nigh, he asked what he might do for her. "Forgive Aunt Shinah, grandfather – please," she replied, referring to her mother's sister who had married a Gentile surgeon. With a sigh the old man consented; according to legend, he died in the arms of his once-exiled daughter as Rebecca sat silently weeping in a corner.

Rebecca Gratz

Rebecca's fame as "an intelligent, gracious hostess, the central figure in a circle of charm and wit and beauty," only intensified over the years. She died in 1869 at the age of 88. Her story has been told many times; a pleasing account of her life is presented in Rebecca Gratz: A Study in Charm by Rollin G. Osterweis.

It was Rebecca's brother, Hyman, who established Philadelphia's well-known Gratz College with a bequest in his will. And it was her niece, Sara, who, through marriage to Jacob Henry Joseph of Montreal, established a connection between the famous Gratz family and the distinguished Joseph family of Canada.

Rebecca was a voluminous correspondent to many notable figures and left a large and important collection of papers to Sara Gratz Moses Joseph, her Montreal niece. In 1995, Montreal genealogist Anne Joseph published the genealogical work Heritage of a Patriarch, which contains a detailed study of the Gratz-Joseph connection. As Joseph documented, the Rebecca Gratz papers remained in Montreal until 1954, when the family donated them to the American Jewish Archives in Cincinnati. The elegant portrait of Rebecca Gratz by American artist Thomas Sully (reproduced here) is also a Joseph family heirloom.

Note: Through a slip of the fingers I managed to mangle the name of the father in Abraham Cahan's story The Imported Bridegroom in last week's column. The correct name is Asriel Stroon.

Lost Embrace follows the lives of Argentine Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Daniel Burman's gentle Argentine film, Lost Embrace, revolves around a quest for a Polish passport and a son's reunion with his long-estranged father.

Scheduled to open in Toronto on Aug. 12, this appealing drama is set in cosmopolitan Buenos Aires during Argentina's recent economic meltdown.

Leavened by comedic touches, it is grounded by a cast of diverse personalities ranging from a restless 20-something ex-student to a solicitous Jewish grandmother with a yen for humming sentimental Yiddish songs.

Ariel Makaroff (Daniel Hendler), the central character, is a college dropout and the grandson of Holocaust survivors from Poland.

Tired of working in his mother's lingerie shop in a mall, Ariel's passion is to obtain a Polish passport and leave Argentina for supposedly greener pastures in Europe. He enlists the aid of his grandmother (Rosita Londner) to facilitate the lengthy process.

Ariel is not the only person whose thoughts are on emigration. The local rabbi has landed a job in Florida and will soon be on his way.

To impress a diplomat at Poland's embassy and thereby enhance his chances of getting the valued passport, Ariel steeps himself in Polish history and lore, sometimes with amusing results.

In the meantime, he continues his steamy affair with Rita (Silvina Bosco), a buxom blond who slips in and out of lacy lingerie, and whose relationship with a much older man piques Ariel's curiosity.

Ariel's entrepreneurial brother, Joseph (Sergio Boris), an importer/exporter who wants to sell Argentine honey in Canada to boost his bottom line, is content to remain in Argentina.

Lost Embrace, which largely takes place in Once, Buenos Aires' historic Jewish neighbourhood, reaches the core of its plot when Ariel's mother, Sonia (Adriana Aizenberg), informs him that Elias, his father, is returning to Argentina after many years in Israel.

Adriana Aizenberg, left, as Sonia and Daniel Hendler as Ariel

Ariel has heard many stories about Elias (Jorge D'Elia), and has no real desire to see him. Elias, who lost an arm during the Yom Kippur War, contacts Ariel through Saliganis, an Italian shopkeeper.

Ariel's brief encounter with Elias ends in a chase through the congested streets of Once. When Ariel learns why his father left Argentina in the first place, his attitude toward him softens.

Lost Embrace, whose title is most apt, unfolds with effortless ease due to Burman's deft direction and naturalistic performances from his actors.

It is not a great movie by any means, but it is heartfelt and genuine.

China through Jewish eyes

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

After attending a meditation retreat in northern China in 2000, Harriet Morton decided to stay in China and spend Rosh Hashanah with the tiny Jewish community in Beijing. She attended services in the Beijing Synagogue and became intrigued with the country's exotic Jewish communities.

Harriet Morton, right, with Jewish descendant at her home in Kaifeng.

The Toronto-based travel professional has been back four times, escorting tours of "China – A Journey Through Jewish Eyes." Offered by New Wave Travel, the next Jewish tour to China is scheduled for Oct. 19 to Nov. 5.

"China was a revelation," she declares "I don't know what it is about China. I'm comfortable there. Maybe it's the people themselves and learning about their history that I enjoy so much. When I go back now, they know me and it's such a warm and wonderful feeling."

Morton has made numerous friends within China's 600-strong Jewish community, which consists of about 200 Jews in Beijing, another 200 in Shanghai, and the rest disbursed in pockets over the rest of the country. "A lot of the Jews of Beijing married Chinese women, but they bring up their children as Jews. The Chinese women wear Magen Davids. You see them at the services."

She produces the unique copper medallion she received several years ago for her role in bringing the Gift of Friendship art project to Shanghai's Ohel Moshe Synagogue. The medallion features an image of Moses, based on a work by Michelangelo, with Shanghai's Jewish Refugee Memorial Hall in the background. She also shows off some brightly coloured yarmulkes adorned with Chinese symbols: they are souvenirs of Kaifeng, whose centuries-old Jewish community dwindled to almost nothing in the late 19th century.

Morton went into the travel business in 1979 after co-ordinating an Israeli conference for Canadian members of ORT, on which she later served as national president. Travel agent Emile Aufgang was so impressed with her that she ended up working for Aufgang Travel for eight years.

She used to specialize in Jewish tours to Budapest and Vienna before she discovered China. She claims to be the first in Canada to include the once-thriving Jewish community of Harbin on a specifically Jewish itinerary.

Her Chinese tour also takes in Beijing, Kaifeng, Xian, Chongquing, Suzhou, Shanghai and the Yangtze River. "October is a wonderful time to go – it's fall weather and not too hot. And this is really an historic opportunity because the Three Gorges [on the Yangtze] will be filled with water by 2009. If you go now, you can see it before it is flooded."

Although Morton declares Israel to be her "first love" – she has visited the Jewish state about 50 times – she continues to expand her Jewish interests in the Orient. This January she plans to escort her first "Voyage Through Jewish Eyes" cruise along the Asian coast, taking in Hong Kong, Canton, Hanoi, Saigon, Bangkok, Cambodia and Singapore. Travel dates are Jan. 6 to 21.

Documentary chronicles Qassam attacks in Sderot

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Mourners after the September 2004 Qassam attack killed two children. [IPS]

In June 2004, four-year-old Afik Ohayon was walking to kindergarten with his mother in the Negev town of Sderot when a Qassam rocket launched from the nearby Palestinian town of Beit Hanoun exploded beside them.

Shrapnel ripped through Afik's body and killed him.

Since 2001, more than 600 Qassams – cheap, inaccurate missiles – have slammed into this low-income immigrant town. More than 80 fell in the first two weeks of January 2005.

Hamas launches these missiles early in the morning when people are shopping or children are going to school.

Igal Hecht's newest documentary, Qassam, chronicles the people of this town as they try to deal with these regular attacks, and their response to the government's failure to protect them.

It was only after two young children were killed in their sukkah on Sukkot in September 2004, that the government offered to help the town, promising 80 million shekels in aid.

The Israel Defence Forces also launched Operation Days of Penitence into the Gaza Strip, aimed primarily at hitting Qassam launch sites and production facilities. Inevitably, civilians and children were killed.

For the most part, director Hecht stays out of politics. He chooses instead to focus on the citizens of Sderot. One person interviewed was five-year-old Taçer Malka, a classmate of Afik's.

"When I am in kindergarten, I always think about a Qassam falling," the little girl says. "I pray to God and say, 'Enough of these Qassams already.'"

Sometimes it is easy to forget that for every missile attack and every casualty, many are left behind permanently scarred physically or emotionally.

Qassam will be shown on the specialty I-Channel on Aug. 15.

Laughing it up at the Antibes Community Centre

By PAM CLAVIR
Special to The CJN

Morris Grossberg, 76, of Toronto, doesn't mind being quoted – "for a dollar a word."

He's only kidding of course, but when asked how he first heard about the Jokers Wild and Humour Group, of which he is a loyal member, he replied that he "heard a loud thud."

Morris Grossberg

Grossberg is one of about 30 lovers of laughter who meet the fourth Wednesday of each month at the Antibes Community Centre in Toronto, and while we all know that laughter is the best medicine, this group prefers to think of laughter as "jogging for your internal organs," referring to the fact that our sides literally ache when we experience a good belly laugh.

It's been 5½ years since Irv Helpert of Toronto formed the Jokers Wild and Humour Group, which gives people of all backgrounds and ages a chance to enjoy some good, hearty laughs while helping charity at the same time.

The members take their laughs quite seriously, and sometimes study the art of joke telling. One member, Neil Berger, who used to be a stand-up comedian and joke writer for Jerry Seinfeld and Joan Rivers, occasionally gives instruction on how to tell a joke. Berger attends the monthly meetings by driving to Bathurst Street south of Steeles Avenue each month from Brampton. Others come from as far away as Oakville and Milton, but most are local residents.

During each meeting, moderator Marvin Brown clutches a microphone while timing each joke. "Tonight's jokes are running at between eight seconds and 422 seconds," he announced. "Try to keep your jokes under a minute." If a joke runs too long, he asks the tellers to take their seats.

Participants sit in a circle, passing a microphone from joke teller to joke teller. Most stand to perform their jokes. You don't have to tell a joke if you'd rather not, but if you do, the group prefers it if you tell it from memory rather than reading it. If you must read it, it's wise to add some inflection to your voice.

"You also need proper timing," advises Grossberg. "Otherwise, people will fall asleep." He adds that some introverts who joined the group awhile back were too timid to speak up at first. Now, he says, they have gained enough self-confidence to open up and tell their jokes to an audience hungry for a good laugh.

While there is no admission fee, Helpert asks for a donation of $3 for each session. The charities the donation money goes to include the United Way, University of Toronto, Canadian National Institute for the Blind and some Jewish causes. Helpert also uses a portion of the donation funds to purchase raffle prizes, which adds sparkle to each evening.

Are all the jokes that you hear at this group really that funny? "One person can be laughing like * and the next person can wonder what the * he's laughing at," Grossberg says.

For more information on the Jokers Wild and Humour Group, contact Helpert at 416-661-2541.

Tourism to Israel on the rise

Over 20 per cent increase in Canadian travellers

JERUSALEM — Tourism to Israel seems to be rebounding, and it's partly thanks to Canadians.

Statistics released by Israel's Ministry of Tourism and Central Bureau of Statistics show tourist arrivals to Israel jumped 29 per cent in June to 157,000.

In the first six months of the year 864,200 tourists entered the country, 27 per cent more than in the same period last year. In the months between January and May 2005, there was a 20 per cent increase in the number of Canadian passport holders visiting Israel. The month of May alone showed a significant 54 per cent increase compared to the same period last year.

"We are witnessing enormous momentum in tourism," says Israeli Tourism Minister Avraham Hirchson. "The rise heralds a new era for the Israeli economy."

Director General Eli Cohen credits the ministry's efforts to bring additional cruise companies to Israel's shores for the rise in the number of tourists arriving by sea. Two thousand people arrived aboard cruise ships in June 2005 compared to none in June 2004.

The monthly report shows 159,000 visitors entered Israel in June, a 31 per cent rise over the same period last year. Out of 864,200 tourists arriving between January and June, 751,700 came by air (up 25 per cent), with 33,500 flying directly to the southern resort of Eilat (a 30 per cent rise); 110,700 arrived overland (up 48 per cent); 3,800 tourists arrived by cruise ship, compared to none last year.

"We are finally seeing the fruits of our labour," said Dani Shahal, director for Canada, Israel Government Tourist Office. "Canadians from all walks of life, Christians and Jews alike, are traveling to Israel in record numbers, whether for religious pilgrimage or simply to have the experience of a lifetime."

In other Israel news, seven new Israeli archeological sites were added to UNESCO's list of world heritage sites in July, bringing the total number to 10.

Three of the newly-designated sites are the archeological tells, prehistoric mounds that conceal layers of ancient settlement dating back to biblical times or earlier, in Megiddo, Hazor and Beer Sheba.

Four historic desert cities, active in the time of the Nabatean spice trade, were also added to the UNESCO list. The cities of Ovdat, Shivta, Halutza and Mamsheet are all in the Negev desert.

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion examined

The Lie That Wouldn't Die by Hadassa Ben-Itto, Vallentine Mitchell.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On May 18, 1943, at the height of World War II, Joseph Goebbels, Nazi Germany's propaganda minister, entered this note in his diary: "I have devoted exhaustive study to The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. In the past the objection was always that they aren't suited to present-day propaganda. In reading them now, I find that we can use them very well. [They] are as modern today as they were when they were published for the first time."

Goebbels proceeded to discuss the Protocols with his boss, Adolf Hitler, who described the tract as "absolutely genuine," referred to Jews as the "Jewish peril" and darkly declared, "There is therefore no other recourse left for modern nations except to exterminate the Jew."

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, an early 20th-century Czarist forgery about an alleged Jewish plot to gain world domination, has been deployed time and time again by anti-Semites to defame Jews and legitimize incitement and violence against them.

Hadassa Ben-Itto's book, The Lie That Wouldn't Die, examines its origins and impact on Jews in the past century.

Although it is not the first, or last, account of this despicable tome, the volume under review is nevertheless well worth reading.

Ben-Itto, a former judge in Israel and twice a member of Israel's delegation to the United Nations' General Assembly, is familiar with the material and presents it cogently.

As she suggests, the Protocols are a mishmash of anti-Jewish myths drawn from disparate sources.

One of the most important, Biarritz, a chilling novel by Sir John Retcliff published in Germany in 1868, turns on the representatives of the tribes of Israel who meet secretly at a Jewish cemetery in Prague.

Clad in ominous long white robes, they discuss their vicious scheme to take over the universe by undermining Christianity, infiltrating governments, controlling the press and fostering revolution.

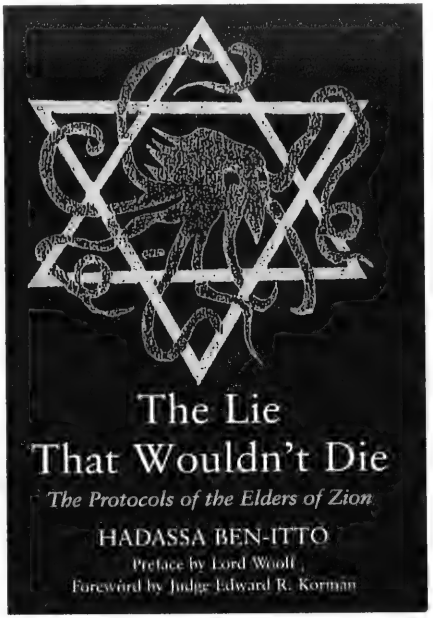
Anti-Semitic figures in Russia seized upon Biarritz, whose author's real name was Hermann Goedsche, a former German civil servant, and used its broad plot to fabricate a mendacious pamphlet titled The Rabbi's Speech.

The Protocols, concocted by Russian government agents who had read The Rabbi's Speech and other such nefarious publications, first appeared in 1903 in a series of articles in the anti-Semitic newspaper Znamia (The Banner), edited by an agitator named Pavel Krushevan.

Two years later, Sergei Nilus, a Russian reactionary of Swedish origin, published the full text of the Protocols in the appendix of the second edition of The Great in the Small, a book purporting to unmask political realities.

Cockeyed as it was, the Protocols was exploited by the Black Hundreds – a notorious anti-Semitic Russian movement – to inflame and incite pogromists.

The czar, Nicholas II, thought highly of its message. On the margin of the copy delivered to him, he wrote that "the directing and destroying hand of Judaism" was behind the troubles roiling the Russian empire.



The Lie
That Wouldn't Die
The Protocols of the Elders of Zion
HADASSA BEN-ITTO
Preface by Lord Wolff
Foreword by Judge Edward R. Korman

His wife, Alexandra Fedorovna, was also a fan. A magistrate who examined her room after she was murdered in 1918 found three books – the Bible, War and Peace and The Great in the Small.

The Protocols had a devastating effect outside Russia as well, as Ben-Itto observes.

On June 24, 1922, two disaffected Germans, Erwin Kern and Hermann Fischer, shot and killed Walter Rathenau, Germany's Jewish foreign minister, in the Berlin suburb of Grunewald.

At the trial, Ernst Techow, the driver of the get-away car, said they murdered Rathenau because they thought he was a member of the Council of the Elders of Zion, whose aim was to dominate the world.

Techow further argued they had performed a public service by eliminating a person who constituted a clear and present danger to Germany.

In the United States, Henry Ford, the automobile tycoon, single-handedly disseminated the Protocols through a brochure, The International Jew, he printed in a newspaper he owned in Dearborn, Mich.

Faced with a Jewish boycott of his cars, Ford recanted, issued a letter of apology and ordered five truckloads of The International Jew to be burned.

For good measure, he instructed his advertising agencies to spend about 12 per cent of the Model A's advertising budget on Yiddish and Anglo-Jewish newspapers.

Ford also demanded that overseas publishers cease publication of The International Jew. But Theodor Fritsch, who translated and published the German edition, refused to comply with his wish.

Ben-Itto's narrative of the unmasking of the Protocols makes for fascinating reading.

In the summer of 1921, the Istanbul correspondent of the Times of London, Philip Graves, who had been an intelligence officer in the Middle East during World War 1, received an unsolicited letter from a Russian named Mikhail Raslovlev.

He informed Graves he had irrefutable proof that the Protocols was a complete forgery. Graves investigated the allegation and found it to be true.

In his scoop, he wrote that they were designed to convey the impression that the prime cause of the discontent in pre-Bolshevik Russia had not been the czar's repressive policies but a global Jewish conspiracy.

Despite Graves' disclosure, the Protocols made headway in Britain.

Victor Mardsen, a former foreign correspondent based in Russia who claimed they had been issued at the first Zionist congress in Basel in 1897, promoted the Protocols tirelessly.

At trials in Switzerland and South Africa in the 1930s, the Protocols were also exposed as crass lies.

But such facts, of course, do not interest anti-Semites.

Numerous editions have been published and are widely available in countries ranging from Russia to Egypt.

Today, the Protocols poison minds and distort reality, all in the service of deepening what historian Robert Wistrich has described as "the longest hatred."

The Lie That Wouldn't Die should be compulsory reading for those whose knowledge of the subject is not yet up to speed.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Shouldn't your entire family be reading The Canadian Jewish News?

Batting cleanup for Canisius College's Josh Matlow

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When they hold masses at Canisius College, Josh Matlow politely declines to attend.

Not that he doesn't respect those who take part in the school's rich spiritual life. He's just grateful the religious component at the Buffalo Catholic school is optional.

As a proud Jew, Matlow acknowledges it's somewhat incongruous for him to attend a Jesuit school. "At first, you feel you won't fit in. I'm proud to be Jewish. I won't hold back," he said.

So far, however, he's found the Canisius experience rewarding. No one holds it against him that he doesn't pray on Sundays. He's only required to take one religion class and there's no religious indoctrination involved.

That leaves him able to focus on his real passion, baseball. Though he's studying phys ed with the idea of one day becoming a teacher, what he really wants to be is a professional ballplayer. Playing as a freshman for the Canisius Golden Griffs in the NCAA's Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference (MAAC), Matlow was broken in slowly, getting spot duty at first and batting in the seventh or eighth spot.

As the 53-game season wore on, he was given more time in the outfield and in the team's last 15 games, coach Mike McRae gave him the opportunity to bat fourth – cleanup – for the Griffs. He finished with a .292 average (it was .321 before a slump in the last nine games) and was second in team runs batted in (RBIs). The Griffs' leader had 60 more at-bats during the course of the season, he pointed out.

Matlow's first plate appearance for Canisius was somewhat inauspicious – he was struck by a pitch and walked. In his first official at-bat, he whacked a triple and drove in two runs. In his best game against Saint Peter's Peacocks, he hit four for five, including a grand slam, and drove in four runs.

Matlow, 20, is satisfied with his rookie performance, but he admits in his first few games he was somewhat awed by the pitching. "These pitchers definitely have more than I've seen," he said.

You'd expect that for an NCAA Division 1 team, not that Matlow's seen all that much pitching in his surprisingly brief baseball career.

It was less than four years ago that he first picked up a bat and glove and decided to give the game a chance.

Up to then, he was into soccer and football.

But about 3½ years ago, he joined some buddies at a baseball camp in Coco Beach, Fla. Before that, he'd never played competitive baseball, but he found he enjoyed the camp experience.

"It was fun. It wasn't just enjoyable – I was able to keep up with the kids who'd been playing for years and years," he said. "I'd never seen a pitch until I went to Florida."

Matlow isn't sure why he did so well with so little game exposure. "I've always loved baseball. I guess it just came to me," he said.

Josh Matlow

Back in Toronto, he signed up for his high school team at Vaughan Collegiate and played in the outfield. He batted .583 in his first year.

The next season he maintained his blistering hitting streak (around .500) and joined the Ontario Blue Jays.

In his third year of competitive baseball, he switched schools to Thornhill Secondary School, where they have a better program than Vaughan, and led the team in hitting with a .612 average.

All the while, he showed his bat could make the difference in any single game. In his first at-bat for Thornhill, he hit a home run off a lefty. In his first five games that year, he hit four home runs.

Matlow next joined the Hamilton Astros in the Connie Mack League and two years ago moved to the Ontario Maple Leafs. After a game against the Welland Renegades, in which he hit three doubles and a single, the opposition coach suggested he consider playing for Mike McRae at Niagara University. When McRae moved to Canisius, Matlow followed him.

Now the head coach at Canisius, McRae said, "Josh is like a lot of Canadian players in that he has tremendous abilities. It's always a work in progress in trying to teach him the nuances of the game.

"He swings the bat pretty well and he has some gap power, the ability to hit doubles.

"In the field, it's a work in progress. He needs to know what base he needs to throw to."

McRae, who is rebuilding the Golden Griffs, said Matlow will get a more prominent role on the team as he develops.

Like other freshmen, he has big days with the bat and others when he goes 0-3.

If he hopes to turn pro, McRae suggested Matlow needs to get bigger, stronger, faster and improve his foot speed.

Though the college season is over, Matlow, whose younger brother, Ely, is a star linebacker for Northern Secondary School, is not sitting on his laurels. He's signed with the Barrie Baycats of the Inter-County Baseball League, the best calibre competition he could find.

By the time his college career is over in three years, he hopes all the work will pay off. Being drafted by a Major League team would be the answer to his prayers.

Correction

Our coverage of 10-pin bowling at the 17th Maccabiah Games should have recorded the medal results as follows: open, Lisa Abush, gold medal; duos, Hirsh Schnayer, Howard Sculnick, gold medal; trios, Hirsh Schnayer, Howard Dinetz, Howard Sculnick, gold medal.

After almost 50 years in Canada, Dr. Thomas Fried, recently inducted into the Canadian Olympic Hall of Fame, is still thankful to live here.

"When I first came to Canada [from Hungary I thought it was] too quiet, but that's the beauty of it. I wouldn't live anywhere else."

As a physician who specializes in sports medicine, Fried, a fellow of the American College of Sports Medicine, was inducted into the hall of fame's builder category.

He was recognized for providing medical expertise, advice and attention at Olympic and Paralympic games since the 1968 Olympic Games in Mexico City, and for treating Canadian Olympic and Pan American team members.

He was also an adviser to the organizing committees' medical commissions for the 1976 and 1980 Olympic games.

Fried has been team doctor to several Toronto soccer clubs, including teams in the now-defunct North American Soccer League, and he was the doctor for the Canadian national team for a number of years. In 2000, he was inducted into the Canadian Soccer Hall of Fame.

A high school soccer player and referee in his native Budapest, Fried was 18 when he was sent to a forced labour camp in what was then Yugoslavia.

"I knew nothing about the fate of my parents and grandmother, [with whom] I lived, but when I was liberated, I made my way home and found my father standing in front of my house smoking a cigarette. He told me my mother and grandmother were inside cooking dinner. I knew then I was the luckiest guy in the world."

He then attended medical school, he says, so he could ultimately work with athletes.

After graduating from medical school in 1950, he joined Hungary's Sport Medicine Institute, and then the government-run Honved sports club, home of such soccer legends as Ferenc Puskas, Jozsef Bozsik, Zoltan Czibor, Sandor Kocsis and Gyula Grosics.

In 1956, however, after the government was overthrown, he left Hungary with his wife Georgina – they've now been married 53 years – and young daughter, by walking across the border.

After arriving in Canada, he interned in Nova Scotia, and eventually landed in Toronto, where for the next 32 years he worked at the Workers' Compensation Board as a physician. When he retired at 65, he was its director of rehabilitation.

Sports medicine is about a lot more than injuries, Fried says. "It is a [combined] science. It involves exercise, physiotherapy, treatment of injury, prevention and fitness."

He spent many years travelling to such countries as India, Pakistan and Bangladesh to teach his specialty, but after contracting dengue fever in Dominica, he stopped travelling.

Fried continued working full-time in private practice until about three years ago, when a car accident sidelined him for a while. He now works part time in his daughter's medical practice, tending mostly to soft tissue injuries.

Life has been very good to him, he says. "I'm alive, I'm in Canada, and I'm doing what I want to do. Every morning I wake up, look around and think, 'He hasn't called me yet.'

"I wanted to be a doctor, and I made it with lots of luck. I don't know why I was spared [in the Holocaust], but I was."

There are no soccer players among his two daughters and five granddaughters, "but I'm very proud of all of them," he says.

Fried says he could write a book about all his experiences. "I've done a lot, and imagine, through it all I've had the same wife."

My friend Allan

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

On Sunday, July 17, my friend Allan passed away. He was 42.

Allan, one of the most courageous people I ever met, was kind, funny, caring, loving and always gracious. He lived an extremely tough life and dealt with issues I cannot begin to imagine. Until his last few months, he lived on the streets of Toronto for years. When we met two years ago, he was living in an underground parking garage.

Before we started talking and hanging out on a regular basis, I never thought we would become friends. I only intended to bring him food and see if he needed help. I had a mindset of what people living on the street were like. But Allan proved that the stereotypical "homeless person" does not exist. With time, I realized he was no different from you or me.

Allan, like myself, was a writer. Quite often when I walked to the subway I saw him sitting outside the Salvation Army, writing away, a pile of inspiring books beside him. He allowed me to read selections from his own book about life on the street.

His sensitive soul led him to watch over street kids as well as over his girlfriend. For the last few months of his life, he shared an apartment with her. But much of his time was still spent sitting outside the Salvation Army during the day. Sometimes when I walked by, he would be talking to someone about his love for animals. He actually introduced me to many individuals in my own neighbourhood. Dozens of people, including police officers, brought food for Sasha, Allan's beloved dog. Sasha adored him and never left his side. Allan once told me Sasha gave him a reason to live.

Allan bravely spent six weeks in a residential program at the end of last year attempting to overcome alcoholism – it was a milestone in his life. When he told me he was going into rehab he looked scared, but he was determined to turn his misfortune around. And for awhile, he did. Unfortunately, he never got the opportunity to try again, but I know he would have.

Soon after Allan's death, a collection of flowers and cards began to accumulate outside "his spot." He was definitely an icon in the neighbourhood.

Even in his death, he managed to bring people together in an extraordinary way. Friends and family attended the memorial – the large room was almost full. In front of me sat two well-dressed women, next to them a young man in a three-piece suit. To my left was someone I just saw on the street asking for spare change. A prayer book temporarily replaced his worn-out cardboard sign.

That day, materialism didn't matter. Neither did race, culture, ethnicity, background or religion. All that mattered was our shared love for Allan.

During the eulogy, Phil Shropshall, a Salvation Army co-ordinator, tearfully said, "I used to have little compassion for people in Allan's position, but Allan changed that. I could have easily been in his shoes. He helped me reconnect to humanity; he was like my brother."

Allan's sister described him as "the kindest man I ever knew. He was like a bird with a broken wing."

Walking to the subway is no longer the same. I miss Allan's smile and laughter and his inspiring determination to fight, struggle and persevere. But I am fortunate that he was in my life at all. I see the world differently because of him – especially the beauty. My memories of Allan Kennedy will live on forever.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

While in Israel for a trip of some Board of Jewish Education business and some "re-creation" (I think Israel provides the original sense of that word!), I attended the opening ceremonies of the 17th Maccabiah in Ramat Gan. This quadrennial gathering of athletes from around the Jewish world is as good an occasion as any for reflecting on the bridge between Israel and Diaspora communities, and especially the nature of that relationship in the curricula of our various educational programs.

As I heard the names of countries called for their delegation to enter the stadium, many associations came to mind. The order was based on the Hebrew alphabet which put Australia first with an aleph and Canada near the end with a kuf. This, in itself, was instructive. The Aussies deserved to be first for many reasons: the "A", the aleph, theirs was the largest Diaspora contingent, and of course, they were the sad victims of the infamous bridge accident of 1997. But did the Canadian athletes know why kuf trumped "C"? How does their Jewish literacy compare to their Jewish/Zionist identity and to their talents in sport?

And then came countries like Ukraine, Belarus, Latvia, Lithuania and Azerbaijan. Who would have imagined at Maccabiah 13 in 1989 that these countries would be sending delegations of Jewish athletes in 2005? Some would have denied the possibility of any Jewish remnant after decades of communism. Others would have predicted that perestroika and glasnost would have emptied these republics of any remnant that might have existed, and that no functioning communities would exist by 2005.

The audience was informed that the South African delegation was marching with its chief rabbi. One could only imagine the messianic potential of having both Israeli chief rabbis marching at the end with the host Israeli contingent!

In Israel, educators are re-examining the school curricula to determine what can be done to reconnect Israeli children with Jewish communities worldwide, while here in Canada, we are probing ourselves to see what can be done to bring the reality of Israel and contemporary Zionism closer to our minds and hearts. This wonderful program of shared sport had some lessons of its own.

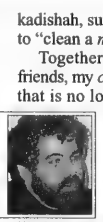
A deed of truth

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



Three seconds. I have often pondered the meaning of this condensed period, since shortly after my father passed away – the second before one dies, the second one dies, and the second immediately following death. If I could slow that time down and watch body and soul through multi-dimensional goggles, what might I see? I suspect that within that tiny space of time might lie the face of truth.

Death. Most of us avoid it whenever possible. We shun its shadowy appearance and hovering smell. Yet, there are those who specialize in death, neither ignoring it nor shrouding it in protective symbolism. These people are members of the chevrah kadishah, men and women whose chosen mitzvah is to prepare a body according to Judaic laws prior to burial.

I have a close chaver (friend) who has taken calls morning, noon or night over the last 18 years as a member of a local chevrah kadishah, summoning him to a funeral home to "clean a mait [body] to meet his maker."

Together with a group of his childhood friends, my chaver participates in this process that is no longer daunting or eerie, and, in fact, has taught him "the raw and real meaning of humility."

The group of four arrive at the funeral home within minutes of one another. They enter a room you and I will likely never see, where a man or a child lies lifeless on a table – sometimes a person they once knew.

Quietly, with great respect, they wash the mait with nine measures of water (taharah), keeping the eyes and private areas covered until necessary. Instinctively aware of each other's role, they cleanse the mait thoroughly and wrap the body in white linen tachrichim (shrouds) while reciting special prayers.

Sand from Israel is placed on the mait reflecting a kabbalistic imperative that a part of the Holy Land should lie with them; pieces of bone china are placed over the eyes to protect them from glaring sunlight when tchiyat hametim (the Jewish belief in the resurrection of the dead after the coming of the Messiah) occurs; and wishbone-shaped twigs are placed in both hands to help the person stand up when that day arrives.

The mait is placed in a coffin and wrapped in an intentionally damaged prayer shawl. The tallit is made "unkosher" so that a full and complete holy item is not buried. Outer shrouds are added, and the team asks the body for mechilah (forgiveness) for the invasive act of uncovering it.

Forty minutes have passed, and the lifelong friends depart, speaking little about their partnership in their work, considered to be a chesed shel emet – a kindness of absolute truth – as no personal repayment will be received.

My friend says there is nothing extraordinary about what he does, but humbly says he has great respect for his partners, "for they are good people."

His wife adds, "What my husband and his friends do is an act of selfless chesed. It's the greatest thing anyone can do."

Whenever my friend arrives home after participation in taharah of a mait, he hugs his children. He does this, he says, because he is clear about the lesson: "Life is short and I know it will end one day.

"Being on the chevrah kadishah, I have come to understand there is no room for arrogance because we all leave this world the same way and I want to make the most of each day."

Death. To some it is a reason to hide. To others it is the consummate equalizer and an opportunity to perform a unique and honourable mitzvah. To me it is three seconds of utter mystery.

One era ends, another begins

These words were written in Jerusalem merely hours after it became illegal – Sunday night at midnight – for Israelis to continue living in the Gaza Strip, and only moments after the beginning of the 48-hour period during which soldiers of the Israel Defence Forces began going door-to-door in the Jewish communities of Gaza, asking the remaining settlers to leave their homes peacefully.

This two-day initiative by the IDF was called Operation Helping Hand to Our Brothers. On Tuesday at midnight, the 48-hour period of grace was to end, after which soldiers would again go door-to-door, no longer to ask the settlers to leave, but to ensure that they do.

As of Monday morning, some 897 of Gaza's 1,486 Jewish families had agreed to leave. Most of the remaining families were expected to depart during the two-day interim period. A handful of families and their supporters from other parts of the country, it was expected, would need to be removed by force. The number of non-settlers in Gaza on Monday morning was said to be as high as 5,000.

Thousands of soldiers have been deployed in Gaza, about half for the evacuation operation, the rest to protect their fellow soldiers and the settlers from possible terrorist attack. In addition, some 12,000 police stood at the ready in Gaza to help execute the evacuation.

On Sunday night, IDF Chief of Staff Dan Halutz told the nation: "We're not going out to battle; there's no battle here and no war."

Speaking directly to his commanders, he said: "You'll be required to look settlers in the eyes, feel their pain, shed a tear and show them you love them."

In the early hours of this past Monday morning, most Israelis were glued to their television sets watching live telecasts from the Kissufim crossing to see the barricade fall for the first time on the newly established Israeli border barring entry into the Gaza Strip.

The News In Brief

CANADA

Park Pulls Jewelry

TORONTO — After complaints from parents and criticism from Jewish groups, Paramount Canada's Wonderland has pulled some inexpensive children's jewelry with symbolism favoured by neo-Nazis from one of its stores. A spokesperson told the York Region Era Banner that the theme park north of Toronto does not agree the jewelry is anti-Semitic, but "we have no intention of offending our guests." One necklace showed an Iron Cross on the forehead of a skull and bones. Another was a triskele, three curved blades that each look like the number seven and are positioned in a circular pattern.

WORLD

Church Targets Firms

SEATTLE — The Presbyterian Church says it will press four U.S. firms to stop providing equipment and technology to Israel. The church said Aug. 5 it has selected Caterpillar, Motorola, ITT Industries and United Technologies for possible divestment if they keep doing business with Israel. Jewish groups criticized the move as unfairly singling out Israel without helping the Palestinians. The move is the latest by mainline Protestant churches regarding Israel divestment. The Presbyterians also said they would pressure the bank Citigroup because of its alleged connection to an Arab bank believed to have ties to suicide bombers.

Messianic Ad Goes Up

NEW YORK — A billboard calling the late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson the messiah went up in Manhattan. Basha Oka Botnick, a spokesperson for the billboard's sponsor, Jewish Women United for the Redemption, told Newsday that the group believes that publicly acknowledging the deceased Chabad leader as the messiah will hasten the onset of the messianic era. Chabad has distanced itself from such groups.

Comments Defended

DENVER — An evangelical political leader is defending his comments comparing stem-cell research to Nazi medical experiments. James Dobson, who founded the Colorado Springs-based group Focus on the Family, said his "recent comments are being spun like a top by the ultraliberals who don't care about unborn life." The Anti-Defamation League and the Reform movement's Religious Action Center have urged Dobson to repudiate his Aug. 3 comments to a radio show that embryonic stem-cell research may have potential, but it should be condemned the way Nazi "experiments" on concentration-camp inmates were condemned.

Permanent Vacation?

LONDON — Britain wants to prevent a radical Islamic cleric, who has called for U.K. Muslims to wage jihad against Israel, from returning to the country. Syrian-born Abu Bakri Mohammed, 47, the former leader of the extremist Al-Muhajiroun group, came to Britain in 1985 after being expelled from Saudi Arabia and was granted indefinite leave to remain. He has described Israel as "a cancer in the heart of the Muslim world" that must be eradicated and blamed last month's London terror attacks on the British public. The government hopes to block his return from a visit to Lebanon under new legislation that would allow the exclusion or deportation of those who preach hate or justify violence.

School Vandalized

LOS ANGELES — A Jewish school in California was vandalized in what's being called a hate crime. Swastikas, cartoon characters and the word "trouble" were found on the Torah Academy in Southern California Aug. 8. Jewish officials said it's not the first vandalism attack on the school. Police are investigating.

Explosives Found in Mall Near Shul

TORONTO —Two small steel boxes with what looked like explosives were removed from a mall just down the street from Shaar Shalom Synagogue last Friday, but police don't believe they had anything to do with the Thornhill shul.

"It was the feeling of the investigators that this incident wasn't targeted to any group," Chief Armand La Barge of York Regional Police told The CJN's Sheri Shefa.

Police evacuated the Shops on Steeles at Don Mills Road and Steeles Avenue after a suspicious package was spotted at 8:48 a.m. by staff cleaning out a vacant store on the mall's second floor. It reportedly contained grenades, dynamite, wiring used to make explosives and ammunition.

La Barge said police rushed to the scene and a bomb squad officer removed the two steel boxes from the complex. No threats were phoned in, no suspects have been apprehended and police don't know why the packages were left there. At The CJN's deadline, police were "still determining whether they have active or inert explosives," La Barge said.

Kippah-clad student harrassed while driving

'Dirty Jew, we're going to kill you'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As a string of anti-Semitic incidents in southern Ontario has demonstrated, many are of the anonymous variety – graffiti left on homes or cars, synagogues vandalized, websites that spew hate.

But a couple of weeks ago, Jacob Kocsis saw the ugly face of anti-Jewish hate up close and personal.

Kocsis, a 21-year old student in health sciences, was driving north on Bayview Avenue near Highway 7 when the car ahead of him hit the brakes for no apparent reason. After slowing down and moving to the median lane alongside the car, Kocsis noticed the driver motion to him to lower his window. When he did so, the kippah-clad Kocsis was subject to a torrent of abuse.

"He was shouting, 'You mother[eff]ing Jew, dirty Jew, we're going to kill you,'" Kocsis related.

The fellow was in his early 20s or late teens, "looked Middle Eastern" and had "an Arabic accent."

Kocsis was shocked at the abuse.

However, his exposure to hate was not over. A few seconds later, a silver car ahead of him slowed down and moved to his left, driving parallel to him in a turning lane. The driver also motioned for him to lower his window and when he did so, "an Arabic-looking guy" started in with similar insults.

"I said, 'What did I do to you?' and I rolled up my window," Kocsis said.

Next, the two cars moved ahead of him and then came to a stop, facing to the left and blocking northbound traffic. They then both made U-turns and headed south on Bayview.

Stunned by what he had seen, Kocsis failed to take down either license plate. When he was interviewed later that night by a police officer at his home, he was unable to give anything more than a rudimentary description of the vehicles (one was a silver or white sedan, the other a black, sportier model).

"I was shocked, as I was born in Canada and I never experienced anything like that," he said. The closest, he added, was from pro-Palestinian activists on campus at McMaster University, where he is a student.

In a hearing room in Toronto last week, the atmosphere was more subdued as a tribunal of the Canadian Human Rights Commission heard a complaint that online hate messages posted by London resident Tomasz Winnicki, 30, attacked Jews, blacks and other minorities and exposed them to hatred or contempt.

Human rights lawyer Richard Warman, who brought the complaint, testified that "the hate propaganda is some of the most horrific I have ever seen."

Warman said he felt personal danger when in the spring, Winnicki posted his photo on a white supremacist website with a Star of David, like a target, on Warman's forehead under the heading, "my enemies," the London Free Press reported.

The tribunal also heard the content of the online messages, posted mainly on the Vanguard News Network. Some called on whites to get rid of blacks and non-white "muds," while other message called Asians "subhuman scum." Jews were described as extortionists who concocted the Holocaust to make money.

"We're coming for you, you Jewish bastards, and there will be hell to pay," said one message.

The CHRC is seeking a $10,000 fine and $70,000 damages.

Winnicki argued that the commission is merely trying to censor unpopular views and later he asked for an adjournment to find a lawyer, even though he had months to prepare a defence. The tribunal reluctantly gave Winnicki five days to find a lawyer, after commenting that he had known of the commission's case since February.

The Free Press also reported that the commission would oppose four of Winnicki's proposed witnesses – Jason Ouwendyk; Melissa Guille; Brad Love, who was convicted

Disengagement: the Israeli viewpoint

From the editor's desk

The sun shone high in the deep blue sky above Rehovot, a small city/town, part of the heavily populated, multi-municipal megalopolis surrounding Tel Aviv in the central Sharon Plain of Israel, where I spent last Shabbat. I was in the home of family.

He is 68 years old, born in Mandatory Palestine of parents who immigrated from Lebanon in 1933. His wife, also born in pre-State Israel, is of Yemeni background. They live in a quiet neighbourhood shared by Jews of all backgrounds and types, observant and non-observant, Ashkenazi and Sephardi, Hebrew speakers, English speakers, Russian speakers, Amharic speakers, friendly and non-friendly, short and tall. Their home, semi-detached with three bedrooms and a small private garden, is modest by Canadian standards but exceptional in Israel for its roominess and private gardening possibilities.

Two of his sisters and a brother-in-law from Poland, who came to Israel in 1948 after surviving Hitler's maniacal efforts at killing him, drove from the Galilee to join us for lunch.

The table was set for a holiday. We feasted on more than a dozen typically Mediterranean, olive-oil-rich salads, six different kinds of cheeses, three different kinds of salty fish, three different kinds of bourekas, oven-baked hard-boiled eggs, jachnoun – the sweet, Yemenite layered dough cake eaten only on Shabbat – endless platefuls of parsley-topped hummus and challah.

We sat around the table and talked. The discussion, of course, was about the disengagement slated to begin some 48 hours later. But the terms "talked" and "discussion" hardly convey the nature of the interaction – I cannot call it a debate or conversation – that took place on that hot and sunny Shabbat.

Emotions were very close to the surface. There were as many opinions as there were people in the room, often expressed at the same time. And no one spoke below a shout.

"I will never trust [Prime Minister] Sharon again."

"He had no choice."

"No one pressured him. Even [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush said so yesterday [referring to an interview with an Israeli journalist that was broadcast on local television Friday]. It was Sharon's own decision. No one forced him."

"He had no choice. It is the only way to separate from the Arabs."

"How can we trust the Arabs? Who speaks for them? Who controls them?"

"[Palestinian Authority President] Abu Mazen [Mahmoud Abbas] must defeat Hamas and the extremists."

"Didn't you hear, didn't you read what Abu Mazen said? This is just the first step. Next is the West Bank and Jerusalem."

"He can speak all he wants. It is up to Israel to agree."

"Israel won't agree? Where have you been living these past 10 years?"

"What will happen after they build the road that joins Gaza to Yehuda and Shomron? The country will be cut in half. We are in mortal danger. There will surely be another war."

"We are already at war. That is why we must separate. We can't continue this way. We must try another way."

"Is this the correct other way?"

"Look how we are treating the settlers. We sent them there and now we are uprooting them from their homes and from their livelihoods."

"The government is compensating them for loss of livelihood, for their homes, for the cost of moving. The government is trying to do the right thing."

"This is the right thing? Jewish soldiers being trained to use force against other Jews?"

"They are training to remove individuals who refuse to be moved."

"[Former prime minister Menachem] Begin did it differently. He gave them three years' notice."

"And still there were resisters."

"I don't trust Sharon. I don't trust any of the ministers who submitted to his blackmail."

"It was not blackmail. It was according to the laws of the Knesset."

And so on… for hours the "discussion" ensued through lunch, dinner and snacks of salty peanuts, almonds, pumpkin seeds, watermelon seeds, chocolate cake, apple strudel and date-filled cookies. They shouted at each other even as they passed the salads and poured the drinks. There was hair-trigger emotion, but no anger. There was, however, sadness, bewilderment and a worried, uncertain hope for the future.

Throughout the day, friends dropped in to convey their Sabbath greetings and to join in the discussion that abated only with the going down of the sun at the end of the day. When the time came for his sisters and brother-in-law to leave, we all kissed and hugged and wished each other and the people of Israel well. I felt like crying.

Then he went to synagogue to sit on a low bench and recite the traditional Lamentations for Tisha b'Av that began with the end of the Shabbat.

Prominent family split over Gaza withdrawal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's said that this month's pullout from Gaza has split some Israeli families along political lines.

The same appears to be happening to one prominent Canadian Jewish family.

Several members of the Bronfman clan, children of the late Edward Bronfman, as well as his widow and daughter-in-law, have written a letter to Israeli Prime Minster Ariel Sharon, distancing themselves from a statement attributed to David Bronfman, another of Edward's children.

The letter, which is to be hand-delivered this week to the prime minister by their cousin Charles Bronfman, tells Sharon that "we totally disagree with [David's] statements and fully support your government's efforts to do what is needed to achieve peace in the region, including withdrawal of Gaza and the West Bank settlements."

The letter goes on to compliment the Sharon government for "making a peaceful and pragmatic effort," and it states the family are "strong supporters of Israel, peace in the Middle East and of a better world for all. May your government continue to be a greater leader in achieving these objectives."

The letter was prompted by a widely reported statement in Israel earlier this summer by David Bronfman that he made while visiting the Gaza Strip as part of a mission led by New York State Assemblyman Dov Hikind.

During a tour of Neveh Dekalim, Bronfman announced a $100,000 (US) contribution to opponents of the disengagement plan. He said he hoped the funds would "help in the valiant effort of stopping this policy."

He then went on to say, "Ethnic cleansing is deplorable to the rest of the world, but here it seems acceptable, even commendable, to expel Jews from their homes."

David's brother, Paul, said, "I shuddered when I saw that. It left me cold."

Worried the public might perceive that David was speaking for the family, Paul said,"We wanted to set the record straight that David's views do not represent the family… He's entitled to believe what he wants to believe. We believe peace is the main destination, as tough as it is to achieve.

"Our father would roll over in his grave to see the family name used to support the settlements," he added.

Paul said the disagreement with David is strictly over politics, and the family gets along well on a personal level.

Rachelle Bronfman, David's wife, said the couple would not comment on the story.

Paul Bronfman said the letter will be sent by courier to their cousin Charles, who lives in Israel during the summer, and he will deliver it personally to Sharon.

Edward and his brother Peter Bronfman, cousins of Charles and Edgar Bronfman, created a business empire that at its peak held assets valued at $100 billion (Cdn). Their holdings ranged from London Life, Royal Lepage and MacMillan Bloedel to Labatt's Breweries and the Montreal Canadiens.

Reunion for Southern Africans

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

In celebration of Habonim Dror's 75th anniversary, the Zionist youth movement is on a mission to reunite former members from Southern Africa.

On September 25, Toronto is holding a reunion, following hot on the heels of a well-attended reunion held in Israel at the end of June and two others that are planned for Johannesburg and Cape Town, South Africa, at the beginning of September.

"This is a great opportunity for all former members to see one another and reconnect, while celebrating 75 years of a successful movement that we all loved," says Mark Skapinker, a former South African Habonim member who has been in Toronto for a number of years.

With reunion plans already well underway, e-mails have been sent out to try and track down all known former Habonim members now living in Canada to invite them to the function at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Already, 140 families have responded, and Skapinker estimates there will be at least 300 to 500 people.

The day will be divided into two parts.

The actual reunion is reserved solely for former members and their families who have lost touch. They will be able to reconnect and "celebrate a movement with which they undoubtedly have special memories," said Skapinker.

The second part is an open event, in which guest speaker Prof. Gideon Shimoni, a former Habonim member and author of Community and Consciousness, a book about the South African Jewish community during apartheid, will address the participants.

"In Habonim we found like-minded people [with whom] we could identify, and most of us ended up taking on huge responsibilities, like running camp, doing fundraising drives, and other intense experiences.

"Most of all though, we had fun and made friends who most of us have kept up with. Many people even met their spouses in the movement," said Skapinker, who attended at least 10 end-of-year camps.

In contrast to the many North American camps that are held for two months in the summer, there are only four South African Jewish camps, which are held for three weeks in December.

The two biggest camps have around 1,000 people campers, and all participants sleep in tents.

Dryden defends gov't record on Israel, day care

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ken Dryden could stop a Bobby Hull slap shot with nonchalance, but when it comes to Israel, the onetime Montreal Canadiens goalie and Hockey Hall of Famer waxes positively rhapsodic.

"The names… the names," Dryden intoned in a near-whisper, recalling his trip to the Jewish state last spring as Canada's minister of social development.

"Certainly, for anybody who has grown up in western Europe or North America and is from the Christian tradition, the names… whether you're particularly religious or not, they're just part of your life," he continued. "And of a sudden, they're there: Bethlehem, the Sea of Galilee, Capernaum. The names that all your life existed only in a book… there they are. And that was stunning."

It was Dryden's first visit to Israel, and it included a much-publicized tour of the Canada Centre in the northern town of Metulla, which houses an Olympic-sized hockey rink and sports facility where the Israeli national hockey team trains.

Alas, he did not lace up the skates.

But his four-day working trip was busy enough with meetings with Israel's housing minister, Isaac Herzog, as well as visits to a day-care centre and a rehabilitation facility for disabled soldiers, an emotional stop at Yad Vashem (which prompted Dryden to write a piece on Holocaust education for several Canadian newspapers), and a tour of Metulla with the town's mayor, Koby Katz.

He also toured Jerusalem's Old City, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and other popular attractions.

Dryden's visit also kicked off negotiations for an agreement on social security between Canada and Israel that would enable the collection of state pensions and benefits by Canadians living in Israel and Israelis living in Canada.

The CJN was invited to conduct an hour-long, wide-ranging interview with the minister and MP for York Centre – a sure sign that either the governing Liberals are slowly shifting into election mode or that they're trying to shore up public support in advance of Parliament's fall session, which is expected to be no less rancorous than the spring one.

(The opposition Conservatives seem to be of the same mindset: this month, Dryden's Tory opponent in York Centre, Michael Mostyn, appeared alongside his party's critic for social development, Carol Skelton, at the Menorah Nursery, where Skelton denounced the government's day-care strategy.)

Dryden, who's in charge of implementing the Liberals' national day-care program, defended the plan as a huge step forward.

In the last budget, the Liberals allocated $5 billion to create 250,000 child care spaces by 2009. Six provinces have signed on to the deal.

"There will be more spaces. The spaces will be better and they will be more affordable," Dryden said, noting that the government's allotment is a 48 per cent increase over what all governments in Canada currently spend on day care.

It's still far less than spending levels called for by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. Late last year, the OECD urged Canada to commit at least one per cent of its gross domestic product – or about $10 billion – to child care.

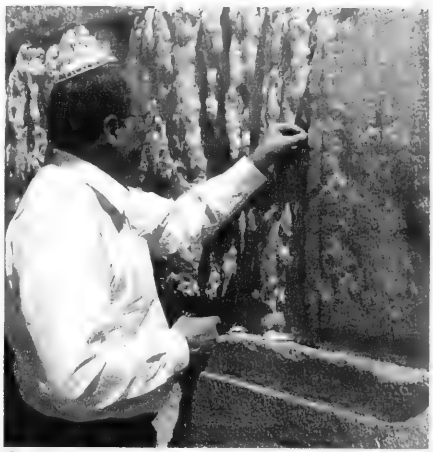
The minister noted that 70 per cent of parents with children under six both work. "It is up to us as parents to find the best answers that we can. So now is the time. Child care is part of the way we live in this country.

"There is public support for something that is good. There is no public support for something that is mediocre, so the quality has to get better."

It was the small touches that Dryden noticed at an Israeli day-care centre, including a plastic protector placed on the hinged part of doors to prevent small fingers from getting caught in the crack.

"Now they're trying to put them in child care centres all over Israel. It's the little answers and the ones that you make up as you're going along that may be the most important."

Dryden said he was surprised by the attitude that Israeli officials displayed when he brought up Canada's voting record on Mideast issues at the United Nations, an issue that angers many Canadian Jews.



Canada's minister of social development in Israel last spring.

"I did bring it up with Israeli officials and they were very dismissive. [They said] the Canada-Israel relationship is all about other things. [Canada's votes] did not upset Israelis. Not even close. The UN is not the central question, isn't the most important part of the relationship. That's what I kept getting told."

Dryden does, however, concede there is a "disconnect" between Canada's Middle East policy, which stresses neutrality, and its habit of abstaining or voting for anti-Israel measures at the UN.

"If we're serious about playing a role in the peace process, how can we best play it? [The] general policy is a very good one and very strong one. Why does it reflect itself in a different way in these resolutions?"

He argues that when it comes to the UN, "things have improved."

Dryden's wish list includes extending quality child care across Canada; helping seniors live "purposeful" lives, not just those based on health and income security; and achieving a "breakthrough" in the protection of people with disabilities on par with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms' protection of minorities.

It's nearly impossible to interview Dryden without touching on hockey, and a broad smile crosses his normally serious face when he spoke about the sport and the Jewish state.

"Hockey in Israel is directed by, driven by, and coached by Russians," he said. "There was something quite nice about that. Canada was the driving force behind the [Metulla] rink. The two most developed, best schools of hockey [are] finding their way together – in Israel."

PRESCHOOL POLICY: Saskatchewan MP Carol Skelton, the Opposition critic for social development, reads to preschoolers at Menorah Nursery in Toronto. She was joined by Michael Mostyn, right, the Conservative candidate in York Centre riding. Skelton used the occasion earlier this month to criticize the government's national day care program, saying a Conservative government would make day care "family friendly" by channelling funds to families and not provinces. Out of Gaza

Hundreds of foreign correspondents, some even from Arab countries, were on hand, the many long-handled booms of their microphones smacking into the video cameras carried by their colleague technicians, all of whom were crammed and jammed into this tiny beachfront of unfolding history.

Halutz did not really need to instruct his officers to feel the settlers' pain. The pain of disengagement lies heavy in the country's heart. Even the majority of Israelis who support the initiative were conflicted at the possibility that their treasured soldiers, most of them barely more than teenagers, would have to forcibly evict other Israelis from their homes.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was scheduled to address the nation Monday night to try to salve the wound that disengagement has cut into the national body, if not into the psyche as well.

Last week, President Moshe Katsav, spoke poignantly to his countrymen and in the name of his countrymen about the disengagement. He acknowledged and paid tribute to the settlers for their staunch patriotism and sense of duty these past four decades.

"In the name of the State of Israel, I beg your forgiveness for the demand that you leave after decades of building and sacrifice… You have risked your lives and your families for your ideals and beliefs… You were not broken… You have attained historic achievements."

But he also urged them to now channel that same sense of duty and patriotism in a new direction for the sake of the country whose former frontiers they manned so proudly. "After a year of difficult struggles and sharp debates, the time has come. You must respect the decision of our national institutions, the government and the Knesset, which were even upheld by the High Court of Justice. Once the decision was made, it became the law of the land, which obligates us all."

The next few days will tell the rest of the story of Israel's final disengagement from Gaza. We pray that no one is harmed.

An era of history has now ended. After 38 years, Israel is leaving Gaza.

But a new era is beginning. After 38 years, Israel is advancing toward the new frontier of consolidating the Jewish majority in a sovereign Jewish state that will stand for all eternal time.

25 years ago in The CJN

- Charles Bronfman announced that he would be shifting his philanthropic and communal activities from the Canadian Jewish scene to Israel.
- The CJN quoted the Financial Post that oil-rich Arab states, particularly Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, had cancelled support for the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund after both organizations voted to deny the PLO observer status.
- U.S. president Jimmy Carter presented Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal with a gold medal for his contributions to international justice.

Muslims in Europe

I find that The CJN makes a fascinating comparison with the Jewish Chronicle, the national Jewish newspaper in the United Kingdom.

In the U.K., the large, increasingly influential and rapidly growing Muslim community is now 10 times the size of the Jewish community and appears strongly anti-Israel with considerable anti-Semitic overtones. According to a report published last year by the Council of the European Economic Community, the majority of the many anti-Semitic attacks within the countries of the EEC are committed by Muslims.

I am concerned by what appears to be an innocent naiveté on the part of CJN journalists and those of other newspapers in Canada. There appears to be a lack of understanding of the fundamental aims of Islam – world domination and destruction of the Jewish entity, among others. I assume this lack of understanding exists because Canada, unlike Europe, is not yet affected by the problems of a large and growing Muslim community with a fundamental, anti-Israel, anti-Jewish and anti-western stance.

Let us hope that the Canadian Jewish community will never have to face the problems of Jewish communities in Europe, but the situation does not look promising.

Christians and Jews

Sally F. Zerker, in "Jews and the cross, an unhappy history," (CJN, Aug. 4) is right in everything she says.

However, the article breathes hopelessness, without any recognition of the Jewish and Christian attempts and successes at removing the crosses in Auschwitz, the repenting statements and actions of all major churches against all forms of anti-Semitism, the corrections in theological concepts about the Jewish people and new attempts at serious dialogue between Christians and Jews as equals.

I would suggest that the "end" of the story of the Christian-Jewish relationship is not symbolized by the crosses in Auschwitz, as Zerker suggests, but by their removal – by the positive encounters between Christians and Jews at the present time – and, hopefully, far into the future.

Cordula Kappner's research

It was with great interest that I read the article "German woman preserves Jewish history," (CJN, July 14). I know Cordula Kappner well. She has researched my family's history and I have participated in her exhibits on two occasions – one in Knetzgau in 1987 and one in Lendershausen, my hometown, in 1992. She is totally committed to the task of researching, preserving and educating the public in the history of the Jews who once lived in Lower Franconia. I was born in Bamberg and lived in Lendershausen with my parents until 1939. My father's brother lived in Burgpreppach, which once had a thriving Jewish community.

Since my name appears in the article, I would like to make a correction in the reporting. I immigrated to the United States from Brussels in 1946 in the care of my uncle. He and his family immigrated to the United States from Germany in 1936. I married in New York in 1953, and my children were born in the United States. We immigrated to Canada in 1970, and my children now live in California.

Response to Gasner

I must take issue with Robert Gasner's unfair assessment of Les Mers Rouges ("Says play equates Israel with Nazis," letter, CJN, July 21). It is the classic example of shooting the messenger because one does not like the message.

The playwright Liliane Atlan never equates the Israeli army with the Nazis. She refers only to one particular soldier in that army, who takes pleasure in inflicting pain on his victims. Since all people, including Jewish people, are fallible, it is perfectly plausible that some soldiers act in a reprehensible way. Not once during the course of the play, however, did Atlan ever question Israel's right to exist or to defend itself from terrorist attacks. On the contrary, she emphasizes more than once that Jews are compelled to fight for their lives and are perfectly justified in so doing.

Gasner's problem, I feel, is that he was acting like the proverbial patient in the dentist's chair. Atlan hit a raw nerve in him, and so he took out his anger against the play, refusing to see that the play was reflecting the complex reality of a tragic situation and not in the least accusing the whole, or even a small part of the Israeli army, of acting like Hitler's brutes.

The science and medicine of suicide bombing

By DR. STEVEN MARC FRIEDMAN

The smouldering mass transit vehicle, once evocative primarily of terror in Israel, is now a phenomenon known to Europe – recently in Madrid, and now in London

Bomb plotters, security experts, and emergency response people are engaged in a cat-and-mouse chase as these horrific acts become a science unto themselves.

What are the logistics of planning and executing a bus bombing, and why are they such an effective means of inflicting casualties? What are engineers and civil defence planners doing to minimize the carnage? What have trauma surgeons learned?

The science of suicide bombs

The suicide bomber is a highly effective delivery system. Israeli experts have described suicide bombers as "the most accurate missile," as a bomber can choose exactly where to stand and when to detonate. There have been more than 100 suicide bombings in Israel, typically in buses and cafes, since the start of the second intifadah in September 2000. These attacks have been responsible for half of the more than 1,000 Israeli deaths from terror attacks during that period. The first suicide bombing in Israel occurred in Afula in 1994, and over the subsequent decade, Israelis suffered from an increasingly refined methodology in their execution.

Bus attacks by suicide bombers typically occur during the morning rush hour, when ridership is high. The bomber boards at a point along the route where a packed bus is likely. He boards at the middle doors in order to be centred in the midst of passengers and detonates shortly after boarding, lest he be discovered, restrained and prevented from carrying out the mission.

The explosives are usually activated by a hand-pulled detonator, rather than a button that might be triggered prematurely. Israeli security sources have also described explosive belts fitted with a cellphone-triggered detonator, so that a remote handler can determine when to detonate the bomber. The bomber typically stands when detonating in order to provide a direct path for shrapnel. Those closest to the blast are typically killed, and those at the ends of the bus may escape with less severe injury.

The primary mechanism of injury for those not killed outright by the blast is penetration by shrapnel. Ball bearings, screws and bolts that are often packed in with the bomb become bullet-like projectiles that remain lethal at ranges of 100 metres. Shrapnel is sometimes soaked in poison, such as organophosphate crop insecticides, to increase lethality.

The size and weight of the bomb is typically limited to what bombers can conceal under clothing or in a large purse or knapsack. However, suicide bombs have become more lethal. Earlier bombs were crude homemade devices, with explosives fashioned from fertilizer and sugar. Explosive power increased dramatically with increasing access to sophisticated explosives such as Semtex.

A high correlation exists between the number of fatalities and the modality of attack. Explosions in confined spaces are associated with a far higher incidence of severe injury and death than explosions in the open air. Explosions in buses or other crowded areas have a devastating effect regardless of the quantity and type of explosives employed. A bomb composed of a few hundred grams of explosive material can easily be carried by a terrorist into a crowd and can cause as much damage as a device carrying tens of kilograms that is concealed in a vehicle.

Café and bus bombings have particularly high casualty rates. Since a blast is best contained if the windows are closed, winter and summer, when heating or air-conditioning may be in use, are the best seasons to blow up a bus.

The science is well understood. During a closed space explosion, an extremely rapid combustion of explosive material occurs. A mechanical shock wave expands at six to eight kilometres per second. Gases formed by the explosion follow the shock, creating a blast wave of high pressure and temperature. The pressure wave reflects off doors, walls and ceiling. For several hundred milliseconds, the casing of the bus will contain the blast, allowing the intensity of the pressure wave to increase markedly. This "overpressure" is momentarily sustained. Air pressure rises dramatically and falls again over fractions of a second. The vehicle's casing then gives way, and the bus ruptures open, often momentarily lifting off the ground.

Car and truck bombs are typically far larger than those delivered by pedestrian bombers, and have predictably devastating effect. Israeli security officials and lay people are instructed to be on the alert for suspicious vehicles. For example, sagging rear ends suggest possible overloading with explosives. On June 5, 2002, an explosives-packed car pulled alongside Egged Bus 830 en route from Tel Aviv to Tiberias. At 7:15 a.m., the bombers detonated their vehicle near the fuel tank of the bus, causing it to burst into flames. In all, 17 passengers were killed. The explosion lifted the bus into the air and reduced the car carrying the bomb to charred metal.

The medicine of terror

Injuries caused by closed-space explosions are primarily classified into three categories.

Primary blast injuries are caused by the sudden increase in air pressure. Air-containing organs are most vulnerable. Eardrums perforate, lungs and intestines burst.

Secondary blast injuries occur when the intense energy released by the bomb propels fragments and debris. Airborne fragments commonly penetrate skull, chest and abdomen.

Tertiary blast injuries occur when the victims themselves are propelled into the air by the blast wave and collide with nearby objects. Blunt and penetrating trauma may ensue.

A fourth category of trauma is burns, caused by the heat and hot gases produced by the explosion, as well as by the ignition of clothing and other flammable material. The burns observed in closed-space victims, such as bus bombings, tend to be extensive and severe. This is thought to relate to containment of the fireball within the confined space of the bus for a long enough time to inflict more thermal injury.

Mass casualty response: loved ones

A bus or café bombing results in a sudden pulse of victims that can overwhelm emergency medical resources. Israeli hospitals equip themselves for onslaughts of casualties as well as panicked family members looking for missing loved ones. The social and administrative challenges are myriad. Communication personnel provide information to victims' families, assist with identification of known patients, and they gather data from, and supply data to, other hospitals, primary physicians and other qualified authorities. Data is pooled and distributed to other hospitals via the Internet. The information is then fed back to health care providers so that they can be better aware of the needs of their patients, and to families to help determine the whereabouts and status of the person they are seeking.

A large pool of social workers is always on call, ready to wade though panic and chaos. Staffing is structured to ensure a dedicated social worker for each individual or family group. Once attached to an individual or family, the social worker will try to focus primarily on that individual or group for the duration of the emergency.

Preventive measures

In January 2004, new measures to protect buses from suicide bombers were revealed to the Israeli public. Israeli Military Industries and the Transportation Ministry collaborated on the system, which consists of a locking turnstile and automatic gates at the back of the bus that can be instantly operated by the driver. A sheet of armour would be mounted on the exterior of the bus, below the window, to shield driver and passengers from exploding shrapnel if the bomber detonated outside. (The success of this system would depend on the driver making visual identification of a bomber.) Later versions would incorporate electronic explosives detectors that would trigger an alarm and prompt the driver to secure the vehicle.

Fundamental bus engineering is also being scrutinized. New designs will seek to minimize the amplification of a blast that occurs in the confined space of the bus. Buses may be divided into smaller sections, and seats constructed out of newer materials that are lightweight but strong enough to shield a passenger's body.

Western academics and politicians struggle over political and strategic approaches to responding to and averting the spread of terror, but that provides little immediate comfort to mainstream citizens who appreciate that a Pandora's box of explosives and suicidal madness has been opened and is not likely to be closed in the near future.

Israel again serves as the canary in the coal mine, a harbinger of things to come, and an example of rational coping in the face of the irrational. As life continues with vibrancy in Tel Aviv, so it will in New York and London, albeit with more security and tension, and a little less freedom, with every subsequent bombing.

It's the future that matters

When asked if I am interested in genealogy, I usually cite the man who said that he doesn't come from a distinguished family but his children do. I, too, am much more interested in the future of my family than in its past.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

This makes me, of course, eccentric. For the current fashion in the Jewish world is ancestor spotting. The familiar game of "Jewish geography" has been augmented by "Jewish archeology." People turn to the past in an effort to find themselves in the present.

It smells of narcissism. Much of our culture is about "Me" (with a capital M). But the preoccupation with my family is a poor substitute for knowing the history of our people. The former is self-centred, the latter essential for Jewish self-understanding.

Most Jews are new to the countries they live in and, therefore, seem to have needs to prove their authenticity. I felt it especially in my early days in Toronto, when a favourite way of putting me down was to tell me, "My family has been here since the 19th century." To have had forbears born in Canada bestowed a kind of status on the descendants that, by implication, placed them above us greeners.

The same is the case in Israel. Old-timers claim precedence over new immigrants. Hence the adage that Israelis are totally committed to aliyah; it's only immigrants they can't stand.

Yichus, or "pedigree," is indeed important in Jewish tradition, and in our times as well – particularly in very Orthodox circles, where marriages are often arranged on the basis of family standing and connections. But there, the status is not determined by the length of time a family has lived in a particular country but by its learning and lifestyle, irrespective of location.

The intention is to make sure that future generations will follow in the footsteps of their ancestors and continue to affirm Judaism in all its manifestations. I am not persuaded that most of today's Jewish genealogists have the same interests.

Though I have never spent time or energy on researching my family history, I am deeply committed to family continuity. The way my children and grandchildren live as Jews matters to me greatly. But I don't base my hopes on what has been, only on what may be in the future. I don't look for role models in the distant past but, perhaps immodestly, I try to be one myself.

My simplistic slogan is not, "The Judaism that was good enough for my ancestors must be good enough for me," but rather, "The Judaism that must be good enough for my children and grandchildren is good enough for me." I call this Jewish continuity.

Getting ready to get back

The end of my summer vacation is fast approaching and my time in the centre of the universe – known outside of Vancouver as Toronto – is coming to an end. I'd be lying, and nobody who knows me would believe it, if I wrote that I've started to get ready for the logistics of this fall's move, but I have definitely started thinking about the emotional aspects of preparation.

Jessica Ayter in Vancouver

The adventures I had in Poland and Israel, and the time I spent with my brother, parents and friends in Toronto, were unforgettably good, and no matter how many times I see my grandparents, it's never enough. I spent a lot of time working at the Koffler Centre of the Arts at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, and I was blessed with having yet another awesome summer employer. This issue of The CJN also marks the end of my career as the paper's "Western Canadian campus opinions columnist."

Luckily, the pending goodbyes and my last paycheques find themselves battling for my attention with the excitement I have for my return to Vancouver and the promise of the coming year at Simon Fraser University (SFU).

As I wrote here a year ago, the wet weather is only one part of what I love about the West Coast. But much else has changed. I'm looking forward to the challenge of taking "Pre-modern Japan" and "Biological explanations for crime," the first history and science courses I've taken since not doing too well in those subjects in grades 10 and 11.

I've also been appointed to a new position on the national board of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS). As a member-at-large, I've already worked with this year's promising incoming national executive to plan a retreat later this month for leaders of Jewish campus groups from across the country. And as the CFJS continues to gain momentum after last year's successes, there are several more national and regional projects in the works that I know I will learn and grow from.

I'm even more excited to see what happens at SFU Hillel this year. With a full-time shaliach and our new Hillel House, the opportunities for engagement and programming seem endless, and the incoming Jewish Students Association (JSA) and Israel advocacy committee presidents are talented, energetic and committed to sharing their positive Jewish campus experiences with other students. I can't wait to step back from my previous role as JSA president and let their creativity take Hillel at SFU in new and improved directions.

But perhaps the biggest change for me will be the move I'm making off campus to an apartment in the middle of the city with my good friend and new roommate. She practises Judaism more observantly than I do, so I'll be experimenting with my first kosher kitchen. We're already planning the parties and Shabbat dinners that we can't wait to host. While I'll miss waking up and rolling out of bed and into class on Burnaby Mountain, with my head literally above the clouds, the change of scenery and more central location of my new place, along with the independence of living off campus, will no doubt prove refreshing.

I've also promised myself that this year, I will finally work up the motivation to take sailing lessons and enrol in ballet classes – after a five-year break from dancing – and get back into snowboarding, too. With Mondays, Thursdays and Fridays off school this coming semester – nobody makes a course schedule like I can – I should also be able to finally take advantage of Vancouver's ocean and mountains for more than their aesthetic value. As well, the extra-long weekends will give me a lot of quality time to spend with my boyfriend and friends whom I've missed over the last four months.

But if just one thing stays the same about life in Vancouver, I hope it's those late-night visits to the 24-hour kosher-style "bagelry" for Montreal smoked meat sandwiches.

One inevitable aspect of my return that I'm not looking forward to: the tired West Coast ribbing about the self-absorption of my hometown.

Girl time at the cottage

I am a very lucky lady. In addition to having a wonderful immediate family, I am grateful for the close relationship I enjoy with my extended family. Recently, I was invited to spend a few days at my aunt's cottage with the girls – my mom's three sisters and my one female cousin. And while many might dread a weekend filled with family and nothing else, I am happy to report that the experience was anything but negative.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

My mom and her three sisters amaze me. Though they all grew up in the same home with the same parents, each has her own distinct personality and identity. I know that this is normal, but I can't help but be amazed at how each woman brings such a different perspective to the table.

About 15 years separate my mom and her older sister from their two younger sisters. Each has kids at a different stage of life, with the youngest sister planning for her son's bar mitzvah while the eldest sister is enjoying her first year as a grandparent. When you add my cousin – the new mother of the family's first great-grandchild – and me – the law school student – to the mix, you begin to get a sense of this amazing weekend of "girl time" at the cottage.

As I embark on my journey to law school, I am truly beginning to feel the end of adolescence and the beginning of independent adult life. Of course, I have lived on my own for the past four years, but with a law degree and employment much closer on the horizon, real "grown up" life seems more imminent than it did in my high school and undergraduate days.

And so this cottage weekend felt all the more special. In a way that's impossible during ordinary family functions and get-togethers, I enjoyed the company of my diverse family members and, from a more mature point of view, saw each one's distinct nature.

Throughout my undergraduate years, as I read feminist literature ranging from Simone de Beauvoir to modern radical eco-feminists, I found myself continually frustrated. I felt that in our day and age, women have the same freedoms as men, and thus the same opportunities, so where does that leave the feminist cause? What remains for women to fight for?

> Our choices are significant and difficult to make

While I have no intention of claiming that a girls weekend at the cottage has led me to see the feminist light, I can say that I am beginning to gain an appreciation for the choices that lie ahead of me.

While in school, it's very easy to develop a one-dimensional outlook. At school, you are directed to focus on your education as the path to a future career or profession and the success you strive to attain within it. And while family was never something that escaped my mind, it was easy, in theory, to make a space for everything – work, family, and everything else.

But what dawned on me during my weekend at the cottage was how significant all of these choices are, and how difficult they are to make. And looking at how my aunts and my cousins balance family and career led me to think a little harder about the future.

I'm in no rush – I want to enjoy my remaining student days and take advantage of all that comes with them. I will say, though, that I gained a profound sense of respect (on top of what was already there) for the amazing families and lives these great women have created, and for the diverse examples they offer me for my own future.

The Kirshner File

Gaza pullout marks a shift for Sharon

A year after being elected Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, spouting a hawkish line, likened Netzarim – the isolated settlement in the Gaza Strip with 496 inhabitants – to Tel Aviv.

"The fate of Netzarim is the fate of Tel Aviv," he declared in April 2002, leaving the unsettling impression that Netzarim, in his own mind at least, was as important as Tel Aviv.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But last week, on the eve of Israel's phased unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and four settlements in the northern West Bank, Sharon's national unity cabinet, by a margin of 16 to 5, approved the first stage of the long-awaited pullout. And in an ironic turn of events, the first three outposts scheduled to be vacated in Gaza will be Kfar Darom, Morag and, wouldn't you know it, Netzarim, which was founded in 1972 when the Labor party governed Israel.

What a difference three years makes.

When Sharon issued his belligerent pronouncement on Netzarim, the second Palestinian uprising was boiling furiously, the Israeli army was reoccupying Palestinian towns in Operation Defensive Shield, Yasser Arafat was president of the Palestinian Authority and Sharon's government was composed exclusively of right-wing parties resistant to territorial compromise.

But today, the situation is different. The intifadah appears to be on the wane, a shaky six-month truce has reduced the incidence of violence against Israelis, Arafat is dead and has been replaced by the more conciliatory and flexible Mahmoud Abbas, and the somewhat dovish Labor party, led by that wily and seemingly indestructible octogenarian Shimon Peres, sits in the cabinet.

These factors, though important in understanding Sharon's rationale for abandoning such settlements as Netzarim, represent only the tip of the iceberg.

Sharon, the godfather of the post-1967 settlement movement but now the nemesis of the 10,000 Jews who will be forced to leave their 25 settlements after Aug. 17, has spoken about his motives on a number of occasions. But in a generally overlooked speech he delivered in Caesarea on June 30, he presented the most cogent explanation of his momentous decision to jettison Gaza.

Referring to Gaza as "an area where there is no chance of establishing a Jewish majority," Sharon said that Israel's national priorities lie elsewhere, in the Galilee, the Negev, greater Jerusalem and the settlement blocs and security zones in the West Bank. He did not dwell on the pivotal demographic factor, but it was implicit in his thinking.

Claiming that disengagement from Gaza will have "a positive and decisive influence" on Israel's security, economy and quality of life, Sharon declared that it will assist Israel in combating terrorism – which has dropped precipitously in the past two years – and in persuading the Palestinian leadership "to stop the terror offensive" and cultivate moderation.

Sharon expressed these views as the intifadah heated up again. Last month, as settlers desperately tried to thwart the withdrawal through protests, marches, speeches, prayers and road blockades, there was an upsurge of violence, capped by the July 12 Islamic Jihad suicide bombing in Netanya in which four Israelis were killed and more than 70 wounded. The second incident of its kind since the cease-fire, or "period of calm," went into effect on Feb. 8, the July bombing was followed by a Hamas onslaught during which it fired mortars and rockets into Gaza and Israel and killed several Israelis.

In response, Israel resumed targeted assassinations; stormed Nablus in a hunt for Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade militants associated with Hamas; temporarily re-occupied Tulkarm after previously relinquishing it in a goodwill gesture; stepped up arrests of Palestinians suspected of engaging in terrorism, and threatened to launch a full-scale invasion of Gaza.

In part, Israel carried out these operations to shatter the supposition, propagated by Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar and others, that Sharon is retreating from Gaza under fire. But it is a thesis worth pondering. The withdrawal is certainly in Israel's long-range interests, but would Sharon have considered disengagement had the Palestinians stoically accepted Israel's occupation and not initiated the second intifadah?

Despite the recent surge of violence (436 incidents in July alone) and the numerous attempts by Palestinian bombers to penetrate Israeli lines of late, the fact remains that suicide bombings have declined radically, from a high of 40 in 2002, the bloodiest year of the intifadah in terms of casualties, to six in 2004.

Israeli military measures, the security fence that snakes around Gaza and the still-incomplete West Bank separation barrier mainly account for the drastic decline in attacks.

But in a few key instances, on Abbas' direct orders, Palestinian police have arrested and clashed with militants. In an obvious reference to Abbas, whom he has met and who has long called for the demilitarization of the intifadah, Sharon said, "There exist in Palestinian society… moderate forces who want to make the right choice."

But what if the pullout fails, fuelling Islamic militancy in Gaza and leaving Israel vulnerable, as outgoing finance minister Benjamin Netanyahu suggested in a gloomy but self-serving resignation speech last week?

Sharon believes that if the Palestinians choose "the path of war and terror" in the wake of the withdrawal, Israel will deal with it efficiently. Indeed, he told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Jerusalem recently that Gaza-based terrorism would be met with a harsh response.

Ariel Sharon

In the meantime, Israel is preparing for the worst-case scenario. It is constructing two additional fences around Gaza and establishing a new defence line adjacent to Gaza, where troops will be redeployed once the withdrawal has been completed next month.

For Sharon, the disengagement is also designed to defuse international criticism of Israel, which has been building since the outbreak of the Palestinian revolt in September 2000. As he put it: "The purpose of [Palestinian] terror is… to force the international community to actively intervene against Israel. Disengagement stopped this trend… Now it is clear to the world that Israel is ready to [make] genuinely painful concessions. Now, the nations of the world have directed their demands to the Palestinians – to dismantle the terror organizations, stop the incitement, introduce law and order, and focus on bolstering Palestinian society rather than destroying the State of Israel."

These assumptions, though plausible, could explode in Sharon's face if he seriously tries to strengthen Israel's hold on the remainder of the West Bank.

It has been said that he regards disengagement as a trade-off: Gaza and the four West Bank settlements in exchange for a relatively free hand in the rest of the West Bank.

Although Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert claims this is not the case, Sharon himself has fuelled such speculation. Shortly after assuming power, he said that he would cede only about 40 per cent of the West Bank to the Palestinians, which is what they presently possess thanks to the Oslo negotiations.

Recently, in a revealing interview with the French daily Le Figaro, he elaborated on his grand vision of the West Bank. In accordance with his oft-stated plan to retain settlement blocs, he plans to expand Ariel – which is deep inside the West Bank– and to create a contiguous territorial link between Ariel and the Green Line. On July 21, Sharon visited Ariel, saying it will remain in Israel's hands. As well, he wants to enlarge Maaleh Adumim, the West Bank's biggest Jewish settlement.

Israel's expansion of settlements, as documented by Peace Now's Settlement Watch, lends credence to the belief that Sharon is intent on controlling a good chunk of the West Bank. The continuing construction is a violation of Israel's obligation under the 2003 "road map" peace plan to freeze such activities.

Israel's separation barrier, which is supposed to be ready next year and may yet form Israel's permanent border, is also problematic. Much of the fence cuts through the West Bank rather than along the Green Line and is cited by critics as an example of Israeli unilateralism. Israel will finish the fence, but it will provoke sharp criticism from, among others, the United Nations, the European Union, Canada and the United States.

In his June 30 statement, Sharon also justified disengagement by claiming that it will fortify Israel's valued alliance with the United States. This could well be true. But in the year ahead, Israel's friendship with Washington may be sorely tested if Israel rejects proposals for further withdrawals from the West Bank to advance the prospect of a viable two-state solution.

Gaza is doubtless an important milestone, but it is merely the first step in a lengthy, historic, divisive, acrimonious process that will set Israel's borders and determine its destiny as a Jewish state.

New shlicha ready for challenges in Toronto

Haifa native eager to begin duties at UJA Federation

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation has a new Israeli emissary on staff, and quite simply, she can't wait to start.

"I am so enthusiastic to start here in Toronto, because I am so impressed with Toronto's Jewish community and its level of generosity and commitment both here, and for Israel," says Keren Hayesod's representative in Toronto Maya Talmon Chvacier, a 37-year-old native of Haifa who happens to celebrate her birthday on the eve of Israel's Independence Day.

Talmon Chvacier comes to Toronto with an impressive background, having received her Ph.D at the University of Haifa, before going on to teach there. For the past four years, she has been the director of the Centre for the Study of the United States.

A mother of two boys, Lavy, 10 and Naveh, 5, the Israeli native is also happy to come to Toronto for what she calls "a new challenge."

"From what I know about Jewish Toronto so far, one of my priorities in this new job is to bring more disconnected Jews - those who are not affiliated in any real way - to a Jewish lifestyle," she says. "I want to perform a lot of outreach for these people, and we're currently looking at new and innovative ways to do that."

Maya Talmon Chvacier

Another important goal of Talmon Chvacier involves the development of meaningful programs for young people who have returned from Israel experience trips such as March of the Living and birthright israel.

"These programs are fantastic for our Jewish youngsters to become familiar with their roots, but what I really want to concentrate on is what happens when the programs are over and the participants return to Toronto. I want to stay in touch with these youngsters, and find ways of keeping them involved in Jewish life, so that they can build on what they discovered in Israel."

Holocaust Education Week features a Conspiracy of Goodness

Chances are pretty good that a tiny Protestant farming village in the mountains of south-central France by the name of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon means little to the vast majority of readers. However, as it turns out, citizens of that small town played a pivotal role in the lives of 5,000 Jews in danger during the Holocaust. The towns- people of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon defied the Nazis providing endangered Jews with a safe haven.

For that reason, Weapons of the Spirit: Le Chambon-sur-Lignon: Conspiracy of Goodness will be the opening program at this year's Holocaust Education Week (HEW) focusing on the collective courage of the town's residents. The opening night event will feature speaker Pierre Sauvage, a child survivor of the Holocaust, an Emmy Award-winning filmmaker and founder of the non-profit Chambon Foundation.

With more than 125 programs, HEW, coordinated by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto, is the largest event of its kind in the world. This year it runs from October 27 to November 9 with programs across the GTA and beyond in churches, schools, libraries, and synagogues from Kingston to Sault Ste. Marie.

Opening night speaker Pierre Sauvage (centre) with Righteous of the Nations Marie Brottes and Henri Heritier at the Le Chambon priemier of his documentary Weapons of the Spirit.

"Sixty years have passed since the end of the Second World War and the liberation of Auschwitz, yet Jewish communities around the world still struggle with issues of antisemitism, racism and intolerance," says UJA Federation Chair David Engel. "It is my belief that education is our strongest tool against the ignorance that leads to racism and hate. This is the gift that Holocaust Education Week has been delivering for the last 25 years."

"Each year we dedicate our program to our survivors and their lost families," HEW chair Honey Carr, along with Joan Shapero said. "It is important to honour the victims and preserve their stories and memories. We pay tribute to their courage."

Societies launch UJA Federation Campaign 2006

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Over the 92 years since Toronto's Societies were established by Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe, they have helped to strengthen Toronto's Jewish community, promote Jewish education and influence future generations. Last week UJA Federation's Societies division celebrated its annual campaign launch, marking past success and paying tribute to their devoted division chairs Michael Rosenberg and Morris Flicht.

"Societies have been constant supporters of UJA, wholly committed to the State of Israel and to the needs of the Toronto community, and we are grateful for all their hard work and devotion," said Warren Kimel, Campaign 2006 co-chair with Honey Sherman. "We recognize that the Societies represent the foundation of our community and that, as we build for our future, we could not have come this far and accomplished this much without the strength and conviction of our past."

"As a child of Holocaust survivors, I was taught the importance of tzedakah and tikun olam (healing the world) from an early age," added Sherman. "It's a lesson all of you know well and for that reason I can't tell you how much being here tonight means to me."

Flicht and Rosenberg were singled out and honoured for their committed work as division chairs and their continuing contribution to UJA.

"These two men represent everything volunteerism stands for in our community," said Steve Ain, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President of Integrated Development. "After everything, you both still believe in the importance of our cause. We couldn't get two better people."

Torontonians volunteer in Eilat

Toronto's Jewish community - through UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative - enjoys a strong connection with Israel's Eilat/Eilot Region. Two Israeli firefighters visited Toronto last year as guest of UJA Federation, where they met with their Canadian counterparts. Recently, eight young Torontoians volunteered in the Eilat area. Two of them assisted the area's firefighters.

Pictured, Toronto's Rikki Bennie (iside the truck) and Sammy Goren underwent training before joining the firefighters on their calls. "They made us feel like part of the family," said Goren. "We loved coming to work every day."

Exciting new challenge for UJA Federation campaign

Campaign 2006 set to launch on September 1

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

A new initiative to encourage gift increases has been added to UJA Federation Campaign 2006, and the campaign chairs are feeling optimistic about its impact.

The Chairmen's Challenge Fund will match any gift increase that brings a donor up to between $100 and $1000. It will also match any new gift of up to $1000. The fund is being financed by the family of Warren Kimel, who is chairing Campaign 2006 with Honey Sherman

"By us matching their gift increases, people are starting to realize that their gifts suddenly will have that much more impact and significance," said Kimel. "Honey and I have already begun our canvassing, and we're very optimistic about the Fund. The response from community members has been terrific which bodes really well for Campaign 2006."

"We are so very fortunate to have access to this Fund thanks to Warren's overwhelming generosity," said Sherman. "It's been a pleasure meeting with members of our community at all levels of giving so far. Everyone has been extremely welcoming and Warren and I are confident that the Chairmen's Challenge Fund will help us find the new dollars necessary to meet the challenge of this campaign."

Campaign 2006 will work to help children at risk, including Israel's Ethiopian immigrants.

The goal of Campaign 2006 is to raise 10 million additional dollars within three years to create new opportunities for Jewish young people at risk in Israel, Toronto and around the world.

The Campaign 2006 action plan will concentrate on three key areas:

- Social Justice - assisting Toronto's poor and vulnerable
- Re-building Israeli lives - offering new opportunities to help relieve the impact of five years of terror on Israel's youth
- Helping Jewish youth return to Jewish life - programs that will strengthen the attachment of Jewish young people to the Jewish community and Israel.

Campaign 2006 will officially launch at Toronto's Royal York Hotel on Thursday, September 1. The launch will feature The West Wing's TV star Joshua Malina, and Israeli singing sensation, David Broza.

Then and Now

Then and now is a feature of Jewish Toronto which updates readers on recent stories

New BJE inspired book to debut in Toronto schools

On March 17 of this year, Jewish Toronto reported on a new book authored by three teachers affiliated with UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education.

Immediately after the story was published and the book's official launch was held at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Telling Our Story: A History of Jews in Canada to 1920 - made possible through the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Charitable Foundation - caught on with educators. They quickly ordered hundreds for use in Associated Hebrew Schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck Day School and United Synagogue Day School, beginning this coming September.

Telling Our Story, which complements the Ontario history curriculum for grades seven and eight, was co-authored by Dr. Jack Lipinsky, Meir Balofsky and Donnie Friedman. The initiative was inspired by the BJE's Etgar (Challenge) program, which provides funding for innovative educational projects.

Two authors, Lipinsky and Balofsky, will be helping BJE teachers draw upon the book to plan creative, interdisciplinary learning opportunities for their students at a BJE teachers' workshop later this month.

It was all smiles at April's BJE book launch for "Telling our Story," a history of Jews in Canada to 1920.

Innovative centre will enhance Jewish experience

Access to knowledge has always been an integral part of Jewish community life. Literature, music and art continually play a significant role in its evolution and growth. UJA Federation's new Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage promises to continue this valuable tradition of Jewish education and cultural enrichment. The innovative centre, with Susan Jackson as its founding executive director, will integrate the Jewish Public Library, the Ontario Jewish Archives, the Holocaust Centre, the Jewish Pedagogic Library, the Board of Jewish Education's Media Centre and Jewish Information Services of Greater Toronto, providing community members with a higher caliber of events and programs.

Susan Jackson

One of the new centre's main goals is to partner with many different organizations throughout the Greater Toronto Area. Offering joint programming with other institutions and communities will enable the centre to reach out to the unaffiliated and those who would otherwise not attend Jewish events of any kind.

Jackson, who brings with her 23 years of Jewish community experience, is enthusiastic about the broader implications of the centre and its impact on the city of Toronto as a whole.

"We want to collaborate and present programs at, for instance, Jewish Community Centres , synagogues and other cultural facilities that are not necessarily Jewish," Jackson explained. "In this way we will see programming all over the city and, to a wide range of people, educating everyone in the process."

UJA Federation mission to celebrate historic event

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

There are times when it's not enough to learn about urgent situations through current literature, on Internet sites or in newspapers. Sometimes personal experience is essential. Eighteen UJA Federation mission participants will take this notion to heart when, on September 8, they travel to Moldova, Europe's poorest country to celebrate the historic opening of a new Jewish community campus built in the capital of Kishinev with Toronto's help.

Kishinev is home to approximately 18,000 Jews who have been anxiously awaiting the construction of the city's Jewish campus, ten years in the making. The development of this landmark project has in large part been realized through a generous donation made to UJA Federation from the late Steven Lewar. With this lead gift the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) was able to begin building the centre in 2003, which will accommodate the growing array of Jewish communal activities that were once illegal under communist rule.

"This community centre is the main hope and joy of Moldovian Jewry today," said Stuart Saffer, the JDC representative for Moldova. "The site of the campus was the site of the old Jewish synagogue, built in the 1830s, and returned to the Jewish community. It is going to be a one stop address for Jewish community life."

Leo Goldhar, JDC board member and the Kishinev mission co-chair, along with Allan Brown, was clear about the importance of this endeavor and its impact on Kishinev Jewry.

Construction of the new Jewish campus will be completed next month in Kishinev.

"It is our responsibility, wherever there are Jews in need to help them," Goldhar explained. "This is my commitment, to help as much as I can and to get this important message across to Toronto Jewry."

Jewish scientist helps uncover oldest dinosaur embryo

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Almost 30 years since they were first discovered, scientists have successfully excavated two of six 190-million-year-old fossilized eggs containing dinosaur embryos.

The embryos, 100 million years older than any other articulated embryos known to scientists, have provided paleontologists with groundbreaking discoveries about the life and development of the Massospondylus, a plant-eating dinosaur from the Jurassic era.

"The quality of the fossil is superb," said Robert Reisz, a biology professor at the University of Toronto's Mississauga campus. "It is a completely articulated, beautiful skeleton."

But Reisz said the fact that these are the oldest embryos known to scientists is secondary to what he and his team have learned about the life and development of the Massospondylus.

When the embryos were discovered in 1978 in South Africa as a result of roadwork, they were left in storage until three years ago because scientists were unsure how to study them and didn't want to risk damaging them.

After Reisz was approached to head the project, his research assistant Diane Scott, managed to free the embryo after a year of chipping away at the surrounding sediment that even infiltrated the egg using a 100X magnification microscope and miniature excavating tools.

Once she exposed the embryo, Reisz was able to reconstruct a detailed growth trajectory.

In South Africa, the Massospondylus were quite common and many skeletons in later stages of life were discovered. Reisz was able to determine the dinosaurs' growth pattern by comparing it to juvenile and adult skeletons of the same species.

His team, including his assistant Scott; Hans-Dieter Sues, a paleontologist at the Natural Museum of Natural History at the Smithsonian in Washington; graduate student David Evans; and Michael Rath, a scientist at the University of Witwatersrand, discovered how they grew from 15 cm, to a five metre adult.

"This growth trajectory shows us that Massospondylus starts out as an awkward looking animal that is an obligatory quadruped, with a relatively short tail, a horizontal neck, long forearms and a huge head," said Reisz, who considers himself an anomaly by being one of a very few Jews in this scientific field.

"As the animal grows, the neck grows faster than the rest of the body, but the forelimb and head grow much more slowly than the rest of the body."

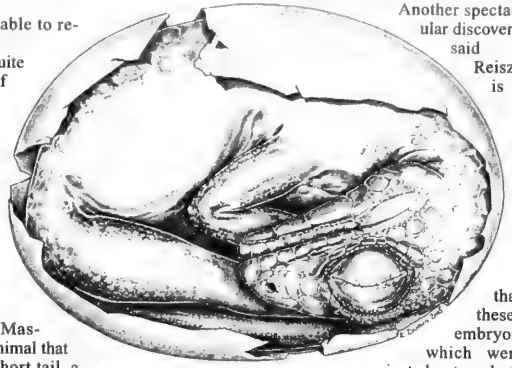
This information, which was published in the journal Science last week, suggests that contrary to most living organisms, they crawled on all fours in their infancy stage and later developed into bipedal dinosaurs.

"I can't think of any other species that does that other than humans. As babies, some lizards and crocodiles can scurry around on their hind legs for a short distance, but as adults they can't," he said.

But what separates the growth pattern of these plant-eating dinosaurs from most living things is how much they grow from a hatchling to an adult.

For instance, the femur, or thighbone of the hatchling was measured at 1 cm in length. After comparing this to the femur of an adult Massospondylus, which measured 55 cm, they were able to deduce that they grew about 50 times their birth size.

This, compared to the fact that humans, and even elephants, only grow about three to five times their size at birth, impressed the scientists.



Another spectacular discovery, said Reisz, is that these embryos, which were just about ready to hatch, had not yet developed teeth. This suggests that these dinosaurs may have needed parental care. Reisz's theory is that the mother would regurgitate plant material for their offspring, similar to the way birds regurgitate insects for their young.

Reisz, the McGill University graduate who often struggles for funding to further his research, said he hopes these discoveries will entice people to look at the growth trajectory of embryos to adults in a new light.

He added that studying relatively smaller, plant-eating dinosaurs is not as "sexy" as studying predators like a Tyrannosaurus Rex, but he still hopes his discoveries will lead to new studies and developments.

His goal is to go back to South Africa, to the same region where the embryos were discovered, in hopes they may discover nesting sites and more eggs, which will give scientists a better understanding of the biology of the organisms.

As for the research, this is just the beginning, said Reisz, who is in the process of developing a paper in much more detail than the one that was released last week.

The Jews of Nagasaki

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

The 60th anniversary of the atomic blasts at Hiroshima and Nagasaki provides an occasion to recall the small but thriving Jewish community that once existed in the southern Japanese port city of Nagasaki.

Nagasaki's Jewish colony was founded by a few Jewish refugees fleeing the Russian pogroms of the 1880s (the town had long been frequented by Russia's Far Eastern fleet). The community soon reached about 100 families in size. A synagogue, Beth Israel, was built in 1894.

With the outbreak of the Russo-Japanese War in 1904, the beleaguered Jewish community of Nagasaki passed its Torah scoll to its counterpart in Kobe. After a severe earthquake in 1923, the town's remaining Jews relocated to Kobe for good. The Russian-born Zionist hero Joseph Trumpeldor (1880-1920), who lost an arm in the Russo-Japanese conflict, lived briefly in Nagasaki and is perhaps its best-known Jewish resident.

According to credible reports, no Jews were living in Nagasaki when it was devastated by the atomic explosion of Aug. 9, 1945, three days after a similar atomic blast levelled Hiroshima.

Nineteen years later, in the summer of 1964, an American Jewish chaplain in Japan attempted to find the community's abandoned cemetery. After much fruitless searching, Chaplain Marvin Tokayer located an old map of Nagasaki that indicated the outline of an obscure rectangular enclosure on a local hilltop. A short taxi ride later, Tokayer ended a trail had he had been pursuing for months.

Scattered in the field before him were numerous stone monuments, many engraved with Hebrew, Japanese, Russian and English characters, all dating between 1880 and 1920. The lost Jewish cemetery of Nagasaki had been found.

Nagasaki's Jewish Cemetery about 1900

An unsigned article about the cemetery appeared in various Jewish publications, including The CJN, in the summer of 1964.

"The Jewish cemetery is on a hilltop overlooking a granite pillar marking the epicentre of the atomic blast," the story reported. "The hill crest protected the cemetery from heat and blast, but almost 50 years of neglect had taken their toll and the grounds were sadly dilapidated."

Tokayer reportedly enlisted some 20 Jews from the Jewish community of Tokyo, the Israeli Embassy and a local American marine corps station and airbase to "clean and restore the cemetery and to recite the Kel Moleh Rachamim… the prayers for the dead.

"With water buckets, weed removers, brushes and soap, everyone worked to clean moss from the grave stones and remove weeds from the grounds. It added purpose to the work to recall that a Jewish community lived, worked and worshipped near the very spot, Chaplain Tokayer asserted."

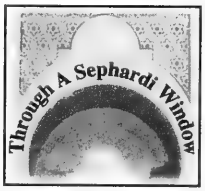
We owe to Tokayer, who later became a noted expert on Oriental Jews and author of The Fugu Plan, the restoration of the old Jewish cemetery in the Sakamoto Gaijin district of Nagasaki. A photograph of the cemetery that accompanies this column and another of the synagogue appeared in the Jewish Encyclopedia, published in the United States between 1900 and 1906.

The 'Canadian experience' dilemma

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the arrival in Toronto of the first Moroccan immigrants. This article is part of a series about the community's early days.

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

In the late '50s, Canada saw a sudden influx of immigrants. Of these, the Moroccans were only a small minority amongst the Italians, Greeks, Hungarians and others.



Immigrants were not always welcomed warmly – this was well before the birth of the social theory of multiculturalism. At the time, the University of Toronto conducted a social experiment in which individuals who were quite obviously new to the country were dispatched to the then very "WASPy" borough of Scarborough. There they were to go from door to door, offering six $1 bills in return for a $5 bill. It was found that there was not even one individual who would accept their proposition. Such was the disdain for and distrust of these new Canadians.

Nowhere did this feeling make itself felt more for the newcomers than in their attempt to find a job.

Like all newcomers, the Moroccans came prepared to work in order to provide for their families. They quickly found that their eagerness to do an honest day's work was insufficient to land them a job.

Those who searched for office work, the same sort of white collar occupation that they had done in the old country, found that the two major employers – the financial and insurance giants of Bay Street – were virtually unapproachable if you a member of a minority.

Furthermore, immigrants seeking to enter the labour market at any level were confronted with the two most heinous words, given as reason for refusal – "Canadian experience," or the lack thereof. This blatantly derogatory and discriminating term was then the politically correct way to communicate that "you are an immigrant, and immigrants are not wanted here, thank you."

Immigrant applicants were told, over and over again, that no matter how willing or capable they might be, if they did not have "Canadian experience" they were somehow not worthy.

Compounding this was the nagging issue of Jewish observance – requests for time off for Jewish holidays and to leave early on winter Fridays for Shabbat.

Few things can be more demeaning, despairing and depressing than being denied the ability to provide for one's family, especially since during all of this time, one's family would go in need. Day in and day out, one would find doors of opportunity slamming in one's face in the wretched name of "Canadian experience."

It was not uncommon to find individuals who, after long, unsuccessful and disappointing searches would accept jobs whose very nature would be crushing to their self-esteem. Family heads with no other income alternative took menial and even janitorial jobs. Many accepted work in factories that more often than not were owned by other Jews or that generally used immigrants as a source of cheap labour.

One has to honour and respect these immigrants who, out of necessity, were ready and able to do anything to support their families in the best and most honourable fashion that was available.

Ba'al Shem Tov

The Besht: Magician, Mystic and Leader
by Immanuel Etkes; Brandeis University Press

Who was Israel ben Eliezer (1700-1760)? He was known as the Besht, an acronym for Ba'al Shem Tov, the Master of the Good Name. Until relatively recently, he was regarded as a semi-literate, anti-establishment figure – a healer of minor ailments and the performer of worthy deeds. He was often depicted as a teacher of children, an elusive personality who spent much time in meditation and solitude. In addition, he taught that sincere religion mattered more to God than knowledge of the Talmud.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Because the whole world is full of God's glory, he encouraged the enjoyment of one's senses. Why should the pious reject the world's pleasures if they could lead to spiritual awareness and growth? This notion was a strong challenge to many ideas current among the Kabbalists of the time who preached asceticism, and even advocated that Jews fast every Monday and Thursday. The Ba'al Shem Tov warned people against such practices, fearing that they would lead to melancholy, not joy.

Immanuel Etkes, professor of history of the Jewish people and education at the Hebrew University, has written a groundbreaking scholarly study of the Besht, whose innovative approach to Judaism proved revolutionary and transformative.

For Etkes, the Besht was undoubtedly the person who set in motion the process that was in time to lead to the chassidic movement. Yet, recent evidence makes clear that he was not unlettered or unsophisticated or an anti-establishment figure. Indeed, he received a handsome stipend from the Jewish community of Meziboz in Poland, where he lived not far from the Lithuanian border.

The Besht, new evidence suggests, was the model of a mystic deeply involved in the affairs of the public, working within it and on its behalf.

Etkes writes, "In effect, the Besht had created a new model of public leader. This model was characterized by a combination of three features: a ba'al shem who is empowered to relieve individual suffering; a leader who applies his endowment of unusual powers to the spiritual and material welfare of the public; and a mystic who paves new paths in divine worship that others are to follow."

One of the novel aspects of leadership advanced by the Besht was the result of the intense mystical experiences he underwent and of his ability – at least as far as his followers were concerned – to advance the cause of troubled spirits in the "Upper Worlds," either by carrying up prayers that have not reached their destination or by redeeming the souls of sinners.

But the Besht was convinced that his mission in life was not confined to relieving the ailments of individuals, that he was responsible also for the welfare of the Jewish people as a whole. He further believed that the unusual powers with which he was graced, those he made use of in his work as a ba'al shem, were conferred upon him in order to be used for both rich and poor, the ignorant and the learned, the lowly and the highly placed.

After his death, his closest followers dispersed to a number of communities in eastern Europe where they furthered their exalted teacher's ideas and way of life.

Chassidism, in its many diverse forms, is a powerful, growing force in modern-day Orthodoxy. Its origins and development, as well as the nature and personality of its founder, are subjects of enduring interest and importance.

Jewish homeschooling

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The days are getting shorter… and kids are gearing up for school. For most of them, that means a daily trip by bus, by carpool or even by foot to meet up with old friends and new teachers. But for a select group of Jewish students, their classroom is in their den or bedroom – and their teachers are their parents.

Some Jewish families are opting for homeschooling because of geographical or philosophical needs. But even if you are perfectly happy with your children's current schooling arrangement, you still have the opportunity to learn about an alternative type of Jewish education. Here's a sampling of comments from supporters and critics of Jewish homeschooling.

"It is fabulous to be able to customize the Judaic and secular curricula to their abilities… I sense that some of the parents trapped in the yeshiva system of school days that run six days a week until almost dinner envy our freedom. And it is not a freedom I would easily give up. Actually, the nicest thing is something my husband learned when he was homeschooled – that learning is a function of effort, not time. If I can teach this to my children…" Anonymous. [www.chayas.com/homeschooltestimony.htm]

"Learning has a multiplier effect when it takes place in groups… You know the line that's been popularized – 'Does not get along well with others.' Well, if you have no experience getting along with others, it's hard to do it." Richard Wagner, head of school at Ben Porat Yosef Sephardic Yeshiva in Bergen County, N.J., to Forward. [http://tinyurl.com/e4j4p]

"My children see their friends almost every afternoon. They aren't busy with homework, after all. Is school for socialization? My experience was always being told to be quiet and not talk to our friends! We are also part of a strong community through our shul and the children are friends with kids of various ages from different schools." Lisa, mother of Rena and Aviv, to the Jerusalem Post. [http://tinyurl.com/am33c]

"We [Jews] are a tribe, a religion, a social entity. We count minyans. We are by definition people who educate in groups… Talmud and midrash aren't monologues. They aren't even dialogues. They're a plurality of voices crossing intellectual abilities, space and time." Rabbi Henry Shreibman, then executive director of Brandeis Hillel Day School in San Francisco, to the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California. [http://tinyurl.com/c6skx]

Aside from anecdotal experience, I couldn't find any analyses online studying Jewish homeschooling in North America. However, I did come across an Israeli report that looks at the phenomenon in that country as well as general principles that seem to transcend borders. Here are two of the reasons the researchers suggest families turn to homeschooling:

• "Homeschooling allows parents… to re-experience and better cope with their own difficult experiences, as well as allowing the parents to invest in their children at a level that they themselves would have liked to receive but did not…

• "Homeschooling is perceived as rescuing the child from regressing emotionally and ethically or morally, which is what occurs when he or she encounters the conventional school system."

The report Homeschooling as a Fundamental Change in Lifestyle was created by the Centre for Futurism in Education at the Ben Gurion University of the Negev. The study is in English. [http://tinyurl.com/exwqa]

Barry Koff has an interesting perspective on Jewish Homeschooling. He has taught Hebrew and Judaic studies at Temple Bat Yahm in Newport Beach, Calif. And he has taught Hebrew and Judaic studies to his twins at home. He sums it up very well:

"Homeschooling is not for everyone. Each child is unique, and every family dynamic is different. But for us, as evidenced by my son's smile and enthusiasm, and my daughter's energy and anticipation, it has made all the difference. I can recite for the first time, with commitment and sense of purpose, the second paragraph of Judaism's defining prayer, the Shema: 'Teach them faithfully to your children; speak of them in your home and on your way, when you lie down and when you rise up.'" [http://tinyurl.com/8oeu6]

Next time, back-to-school resources from Jewish homeschoolers that anyone can take advantage of.

Toronto Salon featured in guidebook for young Jews

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

A guidebook that showcases 50 of the most innovative Jewish non-profit organizations in North America titled Slingshot was launched last week in New York City.

The project, put together by 21/64, a division of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (ACBP), was conceived by young philanthropists who hope the book will expose innovative and forward-thinking organizations to 18- to 25-year-old Jews who are looking for ways to connect with their community.

From JDub Records, a non-profit record and event-production company that promotes Jewish reggae and hip-hop artists, to the Drisha Institute for Jewish Education, a centre for women's advanced study of classical Jewish texts, Slingshot is meant to represent a portrait of the post-modern Jewish community, said Sharna Goldseker, the director of special projects for 21/64 and ACBP.

"We were working with younger funders who felt they didn't have a sense of a Jewish landscape or how to navigate it."

Goldseker added that ACBP recently conducted a report that polled 18- to 25-year-old Catholics, Protestants, Jews and Muslims. Forty-seven per cent of them felt they were in the middle of being "godly or godless." They care deeply about their identity, but wanted to find informal rather than institutional ways to become involved with their religion.

A Toronto-based organization listed in Slingshot, the Jewish Salon, headed by journalist Mireille Silcoff, is meant to fill that void.

What began as a small gathering in her living room two years ago has evolved into an exclusive monthly event that brings young, influential, successful Jews together.

When Silcoff moved to Toronto from Montreal, where she had grown up, she began to "crave something Jewish."

Never one to go to synagogue or join a Jewish community centre, she was inspired to create the salon after attending the inaugural meeting of Reboot, an organization that helps Jews maintain a connection to their roots, which was founded by ACBP and Steven Spielberg's Righteous Persons Foundation.

With themes that range from the concept of sin and the concept of Jews as the chosen people to the construct of the cool Jew, salon sessions are meant to be an outlet for Jews in their 20s and 30s to have discussions and "feel Jewish without having someone wag a finger at you."

The salon caught on so quickly and grew so much that she moved the venue from her living room to a trendy downtown Toronto hangout, the Drake Hotel.

Silcoff, who organizes the salon on her own, puts together reading packages that focus on a particular Jewish theme. The idea is that the participants will come with the knowledge needed to participate in sometimes heated discussions.

"I just wanted them to do the readings and have something important to say."

Silcoff recalled what she described as the most inflammatory session, during which the topic of discussion was the relationship between Jews and money. She said that although some people were getting so angry that they left, "in a way, it was the best one because people were getting so fired up."

Mireille Silcoff

She does, however, make restriction about what can be discussed. She made a rule that anti-Semitism and Israel are two topics that will not be broached because she says there are other outlets for people to discuss these topics, but admitted that she caved in last year when they discussed humour and irony in Israel.

She said the most challenging part of putting the salon together is having to come up with her selective guest list. With the Jewish Salon gaining more popularity as the months go by, this has forced Silcoff to be even more discriminating.

She said that while there is a huge waiting list, she doesn't want this to become something open to the public because, historically, salons are meant to be selective.

"Salons are supposed to be low-fi. With 80 people, it's not going to work."

However, there are plans to expand the Jewish Salon to other parts of North America.

She said there is a huge interest in Montreal and she is in the process of launching one in New York. In Los Angeles, there has been a salon up and running for a year now, and she added that it is very likely that San Francisco will soon have a salon to call its own.

The most important thing to come out of the salon, she said, is the friendships and connections that have been made through a Jewish context.

"It is interesting to them, who like me, are secular Jews with identity problems that everyone has."

Silcoff, who funds the salon on her own, is proud of the fact that it is unlike any other institutional Jewish organizations.

While she is proud to be a part of Slingshot, she thinks of it as a catch-22.

Silcoff welcomes the recognition the guidebook will offer, but wants to keep the salon non-institutional.

"Even if I was offered funding, I wouldn't take it because it goes against what the salon stands for."

The salon is on hiatus for the summer, but Silcoff plans to host another session in late October. This will coincide with the launch of her magazine Guilt & Pleasure, a new Jewish literary magazine that will feature, she says, "some of the best writers and best thinkers."

For more information about the salon, visit http://www.mireillesilcoff.com.

After disengagement, what's next?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As Israel's disengagement from Gaza and part of the northern West Bank neared, Canadian news outlets and much of the international media increased their coverage of this historic event. The Ottawa Citizen and the Toronto Star discussed the implications of the withdrawal as analyzed by two leading Middle East experts, Prof. Gabriel Ben-Dor and Dr. Khalil Shikaki, who recently visited Canada together to brief journalists and policymakers.

(Ben-Dor chairs Haifa University's political science department and is one of the architects of the disengagement plan. Shikaki heads the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, an independent polling institute. Rejectionist Palestinian factions have reacted angrily when the institute's findings have occasionally indicated a trend towards accommodation with Israel.)

In the Ottawa Citizen (Aug. 9) Aron Heller noted that while Shikaki favours disengagement, he is pessimistic that it will reduce violence. He believes Hamas will claim ownership of the disengagement at the expense of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' prestige. Only an Israeli-PA agreement resulting in a co-ordinated disengagement, he said, could bolster Abbas' capacity to prevail over extremist factions in Palestinian society.

Taking a more optimistic approach, Ben-Dor argued against Shikaki. In the post-Oslo, post-Camp David II climate, since Abbas was either unwilling or unable to take on the extremists, Israel felt it had no negotiating partner among the Palestinians and had to pursue a "unilateral" action to break the stalemate. Israel believed this approach would at least reduce friction between Israelis and Palestinians and result in less violence, provided the Palestinians worked to establish civil order.

Heller quoted Ben-Dor: "The Israeli mainstream has made a decision, which is of historical significance, to give up territories [on] a big scale… This has the potential for future progress." But again, much depends on how the Palestinians react to the Israelis' departure from Gaza.

"The disengagement does instill the concept that the fate of the Palestinians in the future is the responsibility of the Palestinians," Ben-Dor said.

In its Aug. 9 editorial, "Give Gazans hope after the pullout," the Toronto Star chose to open with Ben-Dor's more optimistic assessment. "What does the State of Israel stand to gain by pulling its troops and settlers from the Gaza Strip. A lot." Citing Ben-Dor's words, the paper noted that Israel will become "more Jewish, more compact, more secure and defensible and more at peace" – with itself.

The Star urged Abbas to be "resolute enough to prevent Gaza from becoming a launch pad for violence." It called on Mahmoud Abbas to avoid the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's "historic blunder" of not establishing "a credible Palestinian government" under Oslo when he had the chance.

If Abbas could form a respected government, the Star also argued, Israeli opinion might approve ceding "more land for peace," thereby making it harder for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to justify "expanding provocative West Bank settlements."

The Star said the responsibilities fall on both sides, but it emphasized that it's Abbas who "must challenge the prevailing view among his people that violence liberated Gaza, and that a 'third intifadah' is needed in the West Bank." Such ideas are "folly," in the paper's view.

This challenge might very well involve force, Ben-Dor told Aron Heller. "Without some kind of confrontation in the near future [between the PA and the extremists], there is not going to be a chance for a negotiated settlement."

In the meantime, dire predictions – like those of former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu ("Netanyahu sees horrors for Israel" National Post, Aug. 11) that Gaza will become a base for terrorist groups and a launching pad for rocket attacks on Israeli cities – will keep many journalists focused on the aftermath of disengagement. (See also Martin Peretz's "prophecy" in the Aug. 1 New Republic: "The morning after the Israeli pullout from Gaza, the terrorism against Israel will intensify.")

What the media need to examine, therefore, are inter-Palestinian developments. Following disengagement, will Abbas rein in Hamas and Islamic Jihad, and disarm and dismantle terrorist groups, as the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan requires? Or can his attempt to co-opt rejectionists by allowing them to participate in national elections, now scheduled for January, result in anything other than the further weakening of his Palestinian Authority?

CLARIFICATION

The article "Temple Scroll part of Israeli exhibit in Berlin" (CJN, Aug. 4,) reported incorrectly that the Temple Scroll, now on view in "The New Hebrews" exhibition at the Martin-Gropius-Bau in Berlin, had never been exhibited previously. While the exhibition marks its first public presentation in Europe, the Temple Scroll has been on view in the Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum Jerusalem, which holds it and other Dead Sea Scrolls as part of its permanent collection.

Montreal man convicted in U.S. of trying to aid Hezbollah

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A Lebanese-born Montreal man is facing up to 30 years in prison in the United States and a $750,000 (US) fine after pleading guilty in a Little Rock, Ark., court to three counts related to a scheme to ship military equipment to Hezbollah.

A co-accused, a Jewish Israeli citizen living in New York, pleaded guilty in July to the one charge against him and is also awaiting sentencing.

Naji Antoine Abi Khalil, 46, chair and general manager of the Montreal-based import-export company New Line Services, and Tomer Grinberg, 31, an employee of the Tober Group, a shipping and logistics company based in Brooklyn, were indicted in June 2004 in Manhattan Federal Court for their involvement in a plan to export night-vision goggles, infrared aiming devices, and other military night-vision equipment to the Lebanon-based terrorist organization, according to information released by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Khalil, who holds dual citizenship in Canada and Lebanon and resides in both countries, was charged with attempting to provide material support and resources to a terrorist organization and to contribute goods to a specially designated terrorist. Both Khalil and Grinberg were charged with conspiring to export sensitive military night-vision equipment without first obtaining the necessary licenses from the U.S. State and Commerce departments. Grinberg's maximum penalty is five years in jail and a $250,000 (US) fine.

Khalil has also been convicted of money laundering for Russian organized crime through a Beirut bank, for which he could serve up to 20 years.

The two men were arrested in May 2004 after a lengthy investigation by the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and the New York City Police Department.

In May 2004, Khalil flew from Montreal to New York to meet a man who he believed wanted to export stolen electronics goods, but who was in fact a witness co-operating with the FBI in the money-laundering investigation.

Their meetings at the Marriott Marquis Hotel in Manhattan were monitored by law enforcement agents from an adjoining room. The co-operating witness told Khalil during one of those meetings that he had a customer who wanted to ship night-vision goggles to Hezbollah in Athens.

Khalil responded that this was not a problem and that he had "friends."

During another meeting, the witness introduced Khalil to an undercover FBI agent posing as the "customer." The agent provided Khalil with the point of contact and address of individuals who would receive the shipment of goggles and infrared aiming devices in Greece.

Khalil agreed to create a fictitious bill of lading so that the nature of the items and the identity of the shipper would not be revealed.

The next day, Khalil and Grinberg met the undercover agent at a storage facility in Manhattan to pick up the equipment. They were shown a crate filled with the latest technology goggles and the aiming devices, which were designed to be mounted on M-16 and other military rifles.

Khalil and Grinberg then loaded the equipment into a minivan. Khalil accepted $2,500 (US) from the agent as a down payment for the shipment. At that point, Khalil and Grinberg were arrested.

Khalil was detained and Grinberg was released on a $100,000 (US) bond.

At the time, then U.S. attorney general John Ashcroft said Khalil's arrest demonstrated that the United States is "committed to identifying and prosecuting those who would provide equipment and support to our terrorist enemies."

Khalil made headlines in 1992 when his wife gave birth at Montreal's Jewish General Hospital to the first quintuplets ever born in Quebec. He had recently immigrated from Lebanon and was living on welfare.

There was an outpouring of generosity toward the family from the public, business and the government. They were later able to buy a house in suburban Dollard des Ormeaux and Khalil started his own import-export company.

Bertrand's conduct probed

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Quebec Bar is expected to announce this week whether its disciplinary committee will try lawyer Guy Bertrand for unprofessional conduct stemming from his allegation that a Jewish conspiracy was behind the federal government's efforts to deport his client Leon Mugesera, a Rwandan exile accused of inciting hatred and genocide.

Bertrand has been under examination by the bar's syndic since June, when the Supreme Court of Canada upheld a deportation order against Mugesera and severely reprimanded Bertrand for saying Justice Minister Irwin Cotler and Canadian Jewish Congress had plotted to ensure Mugesera would be forced out of the country.

Bar spokesperson Grace Bujold told The CJN that if it's decided Bertrand, a Quebec City lawyer, has violated the professional code, the syndic will file a formal complaint with the disciplinary committee. A date will then be set for him to appear before this tribunal.

She said the committee functions like a court: Bertrand will be called before it at one or more open hearings and may be defended by a lawyer.

If found guilty, the committee will decide what disciplinary action should be taken. Sanctions could range from a reprimand to expulsion from the bar.

Steven Slimovitch, a member of the bar's executive committee, firmly believes Bertrand should be disciplined. "Without a doubt. There's no question he acted in a manner unbecoming to a solicitor and that his comments were atrocious. If he doesn't understand they are anti-Semitic, it's all the more so."

Slimovitch said, however, that he would recuse himself from any debate that may come before the bar about the matter because of his position as legal counsel to B'nai Brith Canada.

B'nai Brith, as well as Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), were interveners in the Mugesera case in support of the federal government's appeal to the Supreme Court.

הכלה הסורית

מצעד הפינגווינים

על כתומים וכחולים

הדמוקרטיה הישראלית מתחלקת עכשיו לנושאי סרטים כחולים (בעד ההפרדה) וסרטים כתומים (נגד ההפרדה). עד כאן הכל דמוקרטי. אלא מה- סיפר לי חבר שקחנה את ריכבו שנשא סרט כחול על'האנטנה- שכאשר חזר לרכב אחרי מספר שעות מצא ששברו לו ולחבריו הכחולים את האנטנות שלהם. זהו הפירוש של חלק מהמתנחלים לדמוקרטיה הישראלית: My way or the Highway-, אבל שישאר בינינו.

Swastika attacks hit prominent Jewish families

By RON STANG
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR — Two prominent Windsor Jewish families were hit by graffiti vandalism earlier this month, with swastikas painted on their properties – one a home, the other a business – at around the same time.

Police said the incidents occurred on either the evening of Aug. 3 or the morning of Aug. 4. In one case, a black swastika was painted on the driveway of Windsor lawyer Harvey Strosberg, a civil litigator and class action lawyer with a national profile and offices in Windsor and Toronto. In the other incident, vandals defaced a store sign for Tepperman's Furniture, a Windsor-based chain of family-run furniture stores in southwestern Ontario.

It's apparently the first time individual Jewish families in Windsor have been attacked so personally, mirroring an increase in similar incidents elsewhere in Canada, said B'nai Brith legal counsel Anita Bromberg.

"When you seek out, as in the Windsor cases, Jews in their homes or… in their businesses, you're making a much more threatening statement, and I think it's disturbing," Bromberg said. "And that's a trend that we're noting."

Two incidents took place around same time

Last year, there were also two high profile local graffiti attacks, but they were against institutional property – in one case against the Windsor Jewish Community Centre and in the other against Shaar Hashomayim Congregation. Also, during last year's federal election campaign, vandals defaced election signs of local Conservative Party candidate Jordan Katz.

Strosberg posted a $3,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the attack on his home. He said "a friend" donated $2,000 anonymously, bringing the total to $5,000.

"I'm not afraid and I'm not intimidated," Strosberg told a local radio station. "This is the act of a coward."

He added that in a country such as Canada, people have the right, within the rule of law, to "stand up and say you disagree" but "you don't deliver a message of hate under the cloak of darkness."

Strosberg said the attacks aren't just a "Jewish problem, it's a problem for everyone," and future incidents could be against a black person, "a Muslim or someone else."

At Tepperman's, a sign with the store's name was defaced with a black swastika measuring about three feet by three feet. It was painted in a blank area beside the company logo.

Noah Tepperman, an owner and third generation executive at the chain, said the two families were hit because they're prominent Jews.

"If you're somebody who is trying to identify reasonably prominent Jewish families, Harvey Strosberg and his children are very successful at what they do. They're in the media a fair bit. My parents are in the newspaper all the time in terms of our advertising."

The Tepperman's location that was hit may have been targeted because it is relatively close to Strosberg's home, Tepperman said.

The chain also has stores in Chatham, London and Sarnia, but there have never been incidents at those locations, he added.

Bromberg said the attacks were similar to those elsewhere that have taken place under "the cover of night."

Although a newspaper report suggested the graffiti on Strosberg's driveway was painted after 9 a.m. on Aug. 4 after Strosberg went to work, Bromberg suggested it's more likely to have been painted overnight and the lawyer just didn't notice it when he left.

"[Daytime vandalism is] not typical behaviour that we see," she said. "Whoever's doing it knows they could be detected during daylight hours, and they typically do it when they know no one's watching."

Bromberg said the attacks fit a pattern of increased anti-Semitic acts across Canada against private property. In 2004, there were 151 such incidents, up from 95 the previous year.

In Windsor, there were nine anti-Semitic acts of all types in 2004, up from two in each of the previous two years.

But despite the spike, the actual numbers are still relatively small, Bromberg said, "so we have to take the statistics with a bit of caution, not to cause a panic."

Windsor is among the 10 most ethnically diverse Canadian cities, according to Statistics Canada, and civic leaders take pride in its harmonious race relations.

But, said Bromberg, "even where people in public office are sensitive to issues that are raised, you have anti-Semitism. And in that way there's nothing unique about Windsor."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I frequently have to grab breakfast on the run on my way to work. What are some suggestions for healthy choices I can get at coffee places?

A. One great new item that most coffee and donut places are offering is yogurt with fruit. This is low in fat and full of calcium and protein, a far better choice than a donut, muffin or buttered bagel. You could try toast with peanut butter, also a good source of protein, and of course, you should ask for whole wheat bread. You could also take a pouch of oatmeal along with you and just add hot water at work for another great and nutritious breakfast.

Q. My blood pressure is high and my doctor has put me on medication to lower it. Is this the best solution or should I change my diet?

A. Hypertension or high blood pressure is a growing problem that causes life-threatening illnesses such as heart disease and stroke. It should be attended to more effectively than it often is. Many doctors prescribe medications to improve the problem because they often do not believe that patients will be compliant in making lifestyle or dietary changes, or they many not know an appropriate diet to lower blood pressure. However, losing weight, exercising and controlling sodium (salt) intake can, for many people, significantly reduce blood pressure.

Q. How much sodium consumption is appropriate for most people?

A. The recommended guidelines have recently been changed from 2,400 mg of sodium to 1,500 mg or less per day. Currently, most Canadians consume at least twice that amount, especially children and teens, so read labels, reduce the use of added salt and avoid processed foods like canned soup and sauces, mac and cheese, snack foods, fast foods and deli meats. This applies to all ages because many people believe that with our current diet and lifestyle, at least 50 per cent of us will have high blood pressure by age 65 and that number will climb after 65. Eating foods high in potassium can reduce the effect of sodium on blood pressure, so choose foods high in potassium like potatoes and sweet potatoes, bananas, spinach, milk, oranges, almonds and watermelon.

In Hamilton, the Jewish community issued a release expressing its solidarity with other minorities after vandals spray-painted swastikas and racist graffiti on an elementary school.

Although the school was neither in a Jewish area nor served Jewish children, the community statement against the vandalism is indicative of the warm relationship with other minority communities, said Gerald Fisher, executive director of the Hamilton Jewish Federation.

Students receive basic training in running a campus group

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

About 85 Jewish student leaders from across Canada will come together at the end of this month to receive basic training in running a Jewish group on campus, in preparation for the new school year.

Representing a diverse spectrum of Canadian student life, executive members of Canadian Jewish student groups such as Hillel, Jewish student associations, Jewish law student associations and leaders of Israel groups will meet at Camp George near Parry Sound, Ont., for a four-day retreat, held under the auspices of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), working with UIA Federation's National Jewish Campus Life group.

Along with basic training on running a Jewish group on campus, the students on the retreat will learn about fundraising, public relations and how to work with the media and student governments.

Crisis management will also be a major aspect of the program, answering such questions as what a Jewish student leader should do if an apartheid wall, symbolizing the Israeli security fence, is built on campus.

"We mainly want to create a strong network of people who can work efficiently and effectively with each other throughout the year," said Sara Berger, vice-president of programming for CFJS.

Although a big part of the retreat will be networking, everything done will be done for a reason and so, even Shabbat, she said, "will essentially be an example of how to run an effective Shabbat with the students on campus – even though we will still have fun."

The idea for the retreat was a "bottom-up" initiative, according to Berger, with the idea coming from student leaders.

Looking at what other countries around the world are doing in their student communities, CFJS saw that with 20 to 30 campuses in Canada having active Jewish students, Canada could form a strong community because there is a relatively small number of students to work with.

CFJS was founded in January 2004 at a conference in Ottawa of 30 to 35 Jewish student presidents representing different Jewish student organizations.

Its aim is to be an umbrella organization for the various Jewish student groups across Canada. It is the first national Jewish student organization of its kind to run in Canada in at least a decade.

"We're going into our second year now," said Berger. "The first year was focused on developing and growing the organization. Now we are looking at leadership development – building a strong leadership."

With a 13-person executive, headed by president, Gary Diamond, the CFJS has already held several successful events.

The One Conference in Montreal saw about 100 student leaders from across the country meet to learn about and discuss event programming and Israel advocacy. As part of the conference, CFJS hosted a party for 1,300 Jewish students from across Canada.

At a regional conference, more than 100 students from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba gathered for a weekend in Calgary. The theme of the weekend was student empowerment on campus.

CFJS is made up of students from towns all over Canada. "A lot is done over the phone and e-mail, but it is important that no city or centre feels left out," said Berger.

Settlers mourn withdrawal from Gaza

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

NEVEH DEKALIM, Gaza Strip — The rabbi's voice rose and fell in a haunting trill over the hundreds gathered around him.

Mothers cradled babies as young men with guns by their sides swayed in prayer and recitation.

"We see this not just as the sacrifice of the Temple but the sacrifice of our land," says Shlomit Landau, 20, who had come to Neveh Dekalim from Jerusalem. "It feels much more meaningful."

Tisha b'Av in Neveh Dekalim, the largest of the Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip, took on an especially mournful tone as it was observed from sundown Saturday to sundown Sunday.

Both residents and the hundreds of outsiders who came from across Israel and the West Bank to reinforce the settlement ahead of the government-ordered evacuation of Gaza, which was scheduled to begin this week, saw special significance in this Tisha b'Av.

The fast day marks the destruction in Jerusalem of the First Temple in 586 BCE and the Second Temple in 70 CE. Observant Jews, such as those who live in Neveh Dekalim, observe the day by sitting on the floor chanting the biblical book called Lamentations.

On Tisha b'Av, many Jews around the world mourn not only the loss of the Temples but other tragedies throughout Jewish history. The Jews gathered here see the evacuation of 21 Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip and four more in the northern West Bank as a monumental tragedy.

"It makes us wait even more fervently for the coming of the Messiah," says Narkiss Netanya, 20, as she finds a place on the sprawling pebble and cement plaza outside the main synagogue complex in Neveh Dekalim, where clusters of worshippers are gathered in large circles.

Netanya is one of many people this week in Neveh Dekalim – part of the main Jewish settlement bloc, Gush Katif – who illegally entered Gaza after it was declared a closed military zone by the army.

Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz, chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces, estimated Sunday that as many as 5,000 anti-withdrawal activists have slipped into Gaza in recent weeks. The government refers to them as infiltrators; the settlers call them their guests.

Whatever one calls them, they could prove to be an obstacle to Israel's plans to withdraw from Gaza.

Forced evacuations of those settlers who refuse to leave three of the settlements – Morag, Kfar Darom and Netzarim – were slated to take place Wednesday; no date has been set for withdrawal from the other settlements, although Neveh Dekalim is among the second round of settlements to be evacuated, according to government plans.

Shmuel Levy, 17, who grew up in Neveh Dekalim, has been hosting several outsiders at his family's home.

He still holds out hope for the elusive "miracle" that might prevent this settlement and the others from being evacuated. Speculation about an 11th-hour miracle is rife in the community.

People are even inviting one another to feasts of thanksgiving to be held should the withdrawal be averted by a divine act.

"We believe that just as in Purim, everything could change at the last minute," says Levy, who said he was discouraged to see eight out of the 10 families on his block move out in recent days.

His family has followed their rabbi's instructions to pack only their religious books. Everything else remains untouched in the home. The decision to not pack up one's belongings and furnishings has become a badge of protest throughout the settlements.

Neveh Dekalim children were seen watering the grass, flowers and trees in their garden as if oblivious to the fact that in days their home will be empty. [Israel photo]

Levy said that seeing so many people from outside flock to Gush Katif gave him renewed strength.

However, he acknowledged the end could indeed be near.

"If it really is to be the last Tisha b'Av" in Neveh Dekalim, he said pausing, "that would be really sad."

Adiel Gehassi sits outside on the wooden benches removed from the Yemenite synagogue in Neveh Dekalim to make room for worshippers sitting on the ground. He says this Tisha b'Av feels extremely personal. He moved here when he was just two years old and remembers no other home or community.

"This is much more difficult than a regular Tisha b'Av. You think more about your own home than the Temple," Gehassi said. "What makes it especially sad is that this is Jews who are doing this. It is very hard to grasp that this is all happening."

Of course, based on a complicated financial formula, the Israeli government is paying compensation – estimated at between $200,000 and $300,000 (US) – to those families who leave voluntarily.

Despite this, the estimated 9,000 Jewish settlers have been reacting to the approaching deadline in various ways.

Some staunchly refuse to pack out of defiance; others hired moving vans and made their way to their new homes inside Israel. Some, like the Issak family in the settlement of Morag, southeast of Neveh Dekalim, chose the middle ground: they packed their belongings into army-issued shipping containers but vow to stay in their home until evacuation day.

As Gabi Issak, 48, packed up his airy two-storey home with the help of his four children, he said that he was preparing for the move – painful as it was for him – because he could not bring himself to break the law. "This is the law. We have to honour the law," said the farmer who has been growing tomatoes, peppers and eggplant in hothouses on the settlement for the past 20 years. "Without laws, this country would cease to exist."

His wife, Nurit, 45, a nursery-school teacher, said the family of six would remain in their empty house as a sign of protest but when the time came to leave they would go peacefully.

"We are waiting for the knock on the door, but then we will go quietly," she said, saying she did not want to traumatize her children by making them witness soldiers and police dragging her and her husband out of their home.

The family plans to move to Nitsan, where the government has set up temporary housing: trailer homes by the beach near the coastal city of Ashkelon.

Meanwhile, at the edge of Gadit, another settlement, Ariel Porath, 46, a round-faced man with a dark beard who owns dozens of acres of greenhouses, is hedging his bets.

On one side of his property, Nepalese workers squint into the sun and dismantle the metal rods that support the greenhouses. On the other side of his land, dozens of Israeli teenagers who are among the anti-withdrawal activists illegally in Gaza, plant tomato seedlings and scallions in the sandy ground.

"I am being strategic," he says with a sad smile.

On Sunday, as part of their commemoration of Tisha b'Av, people prayed by the grave sides of loved ones at the cemetery on the outskirts of Neveh Dekalim, some placing stones painted orange – the colour of the anti-withdrawal movement – on the graves.

The sun blared in the midday heat as people cried and wailed, coming to terms with what may be the last Tisha b'Av in Gush Katif.

Israeli youths block road to Gush Katif, delay IDF

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Some 400 youths opposed to the disengagement blocked the main road leading into Gush Katif on Monday morning, preventing an army convoy from reaching its destination.

The protesters threatened to block the road until Prime Minister Ariel Sharon agreed to cancel his plan to evacuate Gaza.

Meanwhile, border police gathered nearby in case they were needed to disperse the demonstration and open up the road to Gush Katif.

Elsewhere, settlers clashed with Israel Defence Forces troops in separate incidents throughout the Gaza Strip and West Bank before dawn on Monday.

As the IDF closed the Kissufim crossing for entry to mark the start of the disengagement early Monday, a group of youths left the Kfar Darom settlement heading toward the crossing to protest the sealing off of the Gaza Strip.

At the same time, hundreds of Gush Katif youths, both residents and illegal infiltrators, blocked the entrance gate into the nearby settlement of Neveh Dekalim to prevent any troops from entering.

The youths lit bonfires on the road and blocked it to traffic. They slashed the tires of the army jeeps making their way into Neveh Dekalim and also surrounded a stranded army jeep with four soldiers in the vehicle.

Rabbi Shlomo Aviner, head of the Ateret Cohanim Yeshiva, came to the scene and, with a loudspeaker, tried to persuade the rioters to disperse. A major brawl broke out as several youths tried to assault Rabbi Aviner while others protected the rabbi. The army jeep left the area as the brawl subsided an hour later.

Settlers clashed Sunday night with IDF troops in the northern West Bank after the army attempted to impose a seal on the area surrounding settlements set to be evacuated under the disengagement.

Some two hundred residents of the settlement of Shavei Shomron in the northern West Bank clashed with the troops and broke down a gate on the road leading to Sa-Nur and Homesh, two out of four settlements set for evacuation.

An Israel Air Force officer was taken to hospital as medics feared he broke his hand and one settler was also wounded. The IDF detained three protesters.

Outside another Neveh Dekalim home a group of IDF soldiers replace all the tires on their army lorry which had all been slashed during last night by unknown people. [Israel photo]

Shortly after midnight Monday, dozens of settlers clashed with troops in two other northern West Bank settlements, Sa-Nur and Reihan.

West Bank, east Jerusalem next: Abbas

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Monday welcomed Israel's evacuation from the Gaza Strip as an "historical moment," but said that Israel must also hand over the West Bank and east Jerusalem in the future.

"If they want peace, they must allow Palestinians to achieve their rights," Abbas told the BBC World Service.

Palestinians across Gaza celebrated the start of the evacuation process of Israeli settlements on Monday, holding victory processions on the road between Khan Yunis and Rafah and the road from the Kissufim crossing to the Gush Katif settlement bloc.

In Gaza City, members of Hamas hung banners proclaiming the pullout is a result of attacks by militants on Israelis. "The blood of martyrs has led to liberation," one banner said.

Islamic Jihad held a midnight procession to celebrate the start of the withdrawal.

JERUSALEM – The cabinet Monday ratified the evacuation of Gush Katif, the largest settlement bloc in the Gaza Strip, by a large majority of 16 ministers in favor and four against.

Labor ministers backed the measure. The dissenting votes were cast by Likud ministers Limor Livnat, Tsachi Hanegbi, Yisrael Katz and Danny Naveh.

Some activists had called for an attempt to block the entry of cabinet ministers early on Monday, but the vote went on as scheduled.

The vote reflected a compromise decision last February, when the cabinet mandated separate votes on each phase of the disengagement.

In a similar vote last week, the first phase of the disengagement - comprising the isolated settlements of Netzarim, Morag and Kfar Darom - was approved.

Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz intends to bring to the cabinet's approval in two or three days the evacuation of the third group of settlements located in the north of the Gaza Strip, in which only few residents remain.

The date for the approval of the evacuation of four settlements in the northern West Bank has not been set yet.

Mofaz regards the shortening of the evacuation period as highly important, and sees it as the key to performing a successful disengagement.

He has set September 4 as the target date for the completion of the operation, and hopes that it would be completed sooner.

On Monday Mofaz will ask the government to approve the immediate demolition of houses in the settlements of Kadim and Ganim in the northern West Bank, which have already been abandoned by their residents, as well as the demolition of evacuated houses in settlements in the northern Gaza Strip.

On Monday Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was scheduled to deliver a four-minute speech on Israel's television channels, in which he would talk about the disengagement and maintaining the nation's internal unity. In several meetings he held Sunday, Sharon spoke with determination about the disengagement, but expressed concern about his difficult political situation in the Likud party.

"The plans are known, you are prepared, and we are not changing the timetables," Sharon concluded the last consultation he held Sunday on the eve of the implementation of his disengagement plan.

Senior security officials said in the meeting that the order of settlement evacuation will be decided upon Tuesday evening, after the number of settlers who left of their own free will would be determined.

The IDF's dilemma is whether to start the evacuation from the "easy" settlements to the difficult ones, or whether to start the process at the settlements considered to be hotspots of resistance such as Kfar Darom, Atzmona and parts of the Neveh Dekalim.

The Yesha Council protest that began Sunday night opposite the Prime Minister's bureau, a last-minute effort to pressure cabinet ministers into voting against the evacuation of the Gush Katif, ended before noon, many hours before the council planned it would be concluded.

The demonstration was supposed to take place during the cabinet meeting and after it, but only several hundred activists participated in the protest.

Police officials had been reluctant to authorize the demonstration, fearing that ministers who arrived at the Monday meeting would be injured.

Due to the demonstration, and under police authorization, the main road leading the Knesset and government offices was blocked Sunday night and the cabinet ministers arrived at the meeting using alternative routs.

The Yesha Council had announced plans to hold the demonstration regardless of whether they had obtained the necessary permit.

At the end of the protest, settler leaders planned to lead protesters toward Gush Katif in a further effort to thwart settlement evacuation.

The agony that endures

Holocaust survivors are three times more likely to attempt suicide than others in the same age group, a new study suggests. According to findings published in the recent American Journal of Geriatric Psychiatry, around 24 per cent of Holocaust survivors hospitalized at Israel's Abarbanel Mental Health Center have tried to kill themselves, as opposed to an 8 per cent rate of attempted suicide among other elderly patients. According to the Abarbanel staff and Tel Aviv University researchers who carried out the study, it overturns longstanding beliefs that survivors have a stronger will to live. The suicide attempt rate increases as survivors age, the researchers found.

Bibi eyes Al Qaeda risk

Benjamin Netanyahu said the plan to quit the Gaza Strip risked drawing Al Qaeda to Israel's borders. Addressing the Knesset after his resignation as finance minister went into effect, Netanyahu warned that leaving Gaza would make its seaport and land crossing from Egypt accessible to international terrorists. "There is a global enemy, and they will flock here. They are already arriving from Syria, Afghanistan and Iraq," said Netanyahu, who urged MKs to overturn the withdrawal plan.

Little alcohol flows

One in two Israelis avoids alcohol, a government study found. According to Health Ministry dietary data released last week, 50 per cent of Israelis do not drink, making for a low average national alcohol consumption of 20 millilitres per person per day. While the report approved most Israeli eating habits, it found most diets are too high in cholesterol and too low in calcium.

Feast not fast

Avraham Burg, a former Labor Party MK and Jewish Agency for Israel head whose father founded Israel's National Religious Party, said in a radio interview that rather than fast on Tisha b'Av, which marks the destruction of the First and Second temples, he and his family planned to hold a festive meal to celebrate Jerusalem's reunification in the modern State of Israel. Burg's defiance of Orthodox ritual drew quick censure from Israeli religious figures. "The existence of a State of Israel and the rebuilding of Jerusalem are still no replacement for our lost Temple," NRP leader Zevulun Orlev said.

Landau challenges Sharon

Likud Party hard-liner Uzi Landau plans to challenge Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in the next party primary. A primary has yet to be scheduled, but many analysts believe that after the pullout is completed, Sharon's coalition government will fall apart, prompting new elections. Landau would face stiff competition from Sharon's top rival, former finance minister Benjamin Netanyahu. – JTA

Jews' historical ties to Gaza

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Modern Israeli settlement in the Gaza Strip resumed only after the 1967 Six-Day War, but even with those settlements set to be evacuated, Jewish roots in the sandy strip of land where Egypt, Israel and the Mediterranean Sea meet run deep.

Opinions differ on whether the area was or was not included in the Land of Israel conquered by the ancient Israelites in the Bible.

Samson is the only biblical Israelite noted for having set foot there. In the 17th century, the false messiah Shabbatai Tzvi gave the area a bad name when he launched his movement from its shores.

After a contentious debate, Israel's Knesset voted last year to unilaterally withdraw from the Gaza Strip and evacuate the 9,000 or so Jewish settlers who live in suburban-style settlements there, where sprawling green lawns and playgrounds are protected by wire fences and military towers.

The settler population is dwarfed by the 1.3 million Palestinians who live in densely populated Gaza, which is 25 miles long and just six miles wide.

During biblical times, Gaza was part of the land promised to the Jews by God, but it was never part of the land actually conquered and inhabited by them, said Nili Wazana, a lecturer on Bible studies and the history of the Jewish People at Hebrew University.

Wazana, who is currently writing a book on the borders of the biblical Land of Israel, said there are contradictory references to Gaza in the Bible. One passage in Judges – often cited by Jewish settlers and their supporters – says the tribe of Judah took control of the area. But other biblical stories contradict this – a pattern typical of the Bible, she said.

"On almost everything, you will find an opinion and an opposite opinion. It was not a homogenous text. It was not written at same time, and there are competing ideologies," Wazana said. "The question of Gaza is one of the issues where you will find different opinions."

Most Israelis see neither historic nor strategic reasons for staying in Gaza. But to Yigal Kamietsky, the rabbi of Gush Katif, the main Jewish settler bloc there, Gaza is an integral part of biblical Israel.

"Gaza is part of the Land of Israel, no less than Tel Aviv and Bnei Brak," he said. "There is no doubt it is part of the borders." He said that not only is it considered a mitzvah to settle there, but that "if we were not here, I am not sure the State of Israel would still be there."

Rabbi Kamietsky said Jews in the Gaza settlements act as a buffer for those Jews living within Israel's pre-1967 borders. Indeed, some Israeli officials fear that once Israeli troops and settlers are withdrawn from the strip, Palestinian terrorists may concentrate on building rockets that can hit the Israeli city Ashkelon, north of Gaza.

Rabbi Kamietsky notes that historically Gaza was often caught in the crossfire of war.

"Always in history, Gaza seemed more problematic," he said, pointing to the fabled enemies of the Israelites, the seafaring Philistines, who controlled the area in biblical times.

The one period when Jews appeared to have sovereignty over Gaza was during the time of Hasmonean rule, when the Jewish King Yochanan – brother of Judah the Maccabee – captured the area in 145 CE.

Haggai Huberman – who has written extensively on the history of Jewish settlement in Gaza over the centuries and is writing a history of the Jews in Gush Katif – maintains that the Jews who lived there always considered themselves residents of the Land of Israel.

He says that Jews have lived on and off in Gaza since the time of Roman rule, their settlement following a pattern of expulsion during times of war and conquest and return during more peaceful periods. The remains of an ancient synagogue found in Gaza date to around 508 CE. Its mosaic floor, unearthed by archeologists, is now on display in the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

There was reportedly a large Jewish community living in the area when the Muslims invaded in the seventh century. The Jews were noted for their skills as farmers and for making wine in their vast vineyards.

After the Spanish Inquisition in 1492, some Spanish and Portuguese Jews fled to Gaza. They abandoned the area when Napoleon's army marched through, but they later returned in the early 1800s.

When the first wave of Zionist settlers arrived in the region at the end of the 19th century, a group of 50 families moved to Gaza City. According to Huberman, they established good relations with local Arabs.

The settlers stayed until they were expelled in 1914 – along with Gaza's entire Arab population – by the Ottoman Turks during World War I. The Jews returned in 1920. But tensions simmered with both Arab and Jewish nationalism on the rise, and the relations with local Arabs began to sour, Huberman said.

The major Jewish presence in Gaza on the eve of Israel's War of Independence in 1948 was a kibbutz called Kfar Darom, set up in 1946. It was evacuated during the war and was among the first places to be resettled by Jews after 1967. Initially inhabited by Israeli soldiers from the Nahal brigade, it soon evolved into one of several civilian settlements established in the 1970s as the settler movement gained strength.

Any attempt to downplay Jewish roots in the Gaza Strip "is part of the disinformation being spread," said Eran Steinberg, a spokesperson for the Gush Katif settlements.

For her part, Wazana said present-day debates over territory mirror those in the Bible.

"Descriptions of borders reflect different ideologies even back then," she said. "People have put words in the mouth of God even in biblical times. If you have an ideology, you will find the right words to support it."

Some who argue that Gaza was not part of the biblical Land of Israel point to the fact that Orthodox Jews are allowed to consume produce grown in the Gaza Strip during shmittah – the seventh, or sabbatical, year when fruits and vegetables are not to be cultivated in the Land of Israel, according to Jewish law.

But Rabbi Kamietsky said it is permitted to grow produce in the Gaza Strip because even though it is every bit "as holy" as the rest of the Land of Israel, it was not an area settled during the Second Temple period, when Jews returned from exile in Babylon.

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

After eleven years as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents.

For high school students, Libman helps locate suitable college or university programs, and assists clients through the admissions process. She also helps sharpen up their academic skills in preparation for the faster pace of advanced studies.

For students already in college or university, Libman's expertise helps them consider career options, contemplate graduate schools, or navigate the complexity of professional school admissions. Libman's longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Libman often counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows the ropes and can suggest workable strategies for overcoming institutional barriers.

For students considering US schools, Libman recently participated in the prestigious Harvard Summer Institute on College Admissions.

For more information on Ambitions Educational Consulting, visit www.ambitions.ca or phone 416-780-0288 for an appointment.

Judy Libman • ambitions educational consulting

The hardest questions in school aren't on the exam.

• How should I choose a university or college? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • How can I study better, not harder? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic problems? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open - so, now what?

Expert individual educational counselling for high school and post-secondary students.

"A HUGE amount of my success is due to you and all your input. You set me on the right track, put things into perspective, provided me with excellent direct feedback and you made me laugh. THANK YOU."

Toronto Aspirals

Arhythmic gymnastic centre for girls aged four to pre-or early teens, Toronto Aspirals has operated since 1979. It is one of Ontario's oldest, most respected gymnastic clubs. Independent and not for profit, it is affiliated with the Ontario Gymnastic Federation.

Toronto Aspirals unites gymnastics with dance; all activities are done to music. Activities are suited to girls' growing bodies, emphasizing agility and grace, and great for co-ordination, balance and body awareness. Balls, hoops, ropes and ribbons are used -- hand apparatus, which is light, easy to hold, and safe.

Training standards are high. And coaches work with each aspiring gymnast as a unique individual, with her own unique abilities.

From this club have grown competition and performance groups which practice regularly, take part in the Maccabi games, and have won provincial championships.

Toronto Aspirals has locations at Bathurst Jewish Center and throughout York Region. For more information, including the whole range of programs and upcoming activities, visit www.aspirals.com ; or call 905-738-5723 or 416-636-1880 xt. 457.

Oraynu - a totally different Jewish School!

"Do you remember what Hebrew school was like when we were kids? Well, this is different. With a capital 'D'"

Children are engaged in their learning at Oraynu. We teach through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches: our students experience the holidays, tzedakah projects and classroom by being involved first hand. Jewish history and culture are taught from a Humanistic perspective focusing on values.

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is fun – the children have a good time while experiencing a positive affirmation of their Jewishness. Intermarried families are very welcome.

Oraynu's teachers draw their students out of their shells. The children "do" and "act" in lively, rich participatory discussions, Family Education projects, extra-curricular tzedakah projects, music, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of lively fun.

"My kids love it here!"

Imagine a two-year B'nai Mitzvah program where B'nai Mitzvot choose their own projects. You may choose a group or individual ceremony. Torah readings are optional and our unique ceremony is in English.

The Academy For Gifted Children – P.A.C.E.

The Academy for Gifted Children - P.A.C.E. is the only private school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E, is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers programs from Grade 1 through Grade 12. In addition to the basic skills, P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction, and a more complex approach to learning. A fully balanced program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program. Please call the school for registration information: 905-773-0997.

Kindergarten & Child Care Combined

Upper Canada Child Care Centres is a growing family of 40 child care facilities throughout York Region and North York. In addition to operating quality, non-profit care for children ages 3 months to 12 years, five of our centres also offer specialized programs which combine junior and senior kindergarten education with a full day child care component. These kindergarten programs run five days per week for the full year. The Curriculum emphasizes language, mathematics, science and technology, personal and social development and the arts.

Educators facilitate the child's growth by providing a rich and stimulating program. Balanced to provide learning opportunities in all educational areas, our program offers carefully planned and monitored learning centres. These concrete experiences promote competency and encourage self esteem.

Some of the many advantages to this program include: low child:adult ratios, no need for bussing from school to daycare, daily contact with teachers and no alternate day schedules.

Extended hours, nutritious lunches and snacks are provided at no extra charge. Please see our ad for the Upper Canada Kindergarten Program nearest you. For more information on any Upper Canada program, please call our Head Office at 905-946-1113.

Give Your Child An Educational Advantage

The Math Masters/Don Valley Academy student understands that the learning process is not a universal approach. The student is an individual, and each individual must apply the most effective and efficient means to reach his or her goal of academic excellence. Personalized and self-paced learning programs cater to the needs and diverse learning styles of each student. Whether enrolled in private tutoring, a credit course, or a support/enrichment program, the instructor will challenge and motivate the student to attain academic success.

Math Masters tutoring programs emphasize effective study skills, time management, organizational skills, motivational techniques, and memory training. The Math Masters student will experience an improvement in grades and long-term retention of learned material, as well as an increase in confidence and self-esteem.

Don Valley Preparatory Academy is an accredited, ministry-inspected private high school, offering credit courses for students from grades nine to twelve. What makes Don Valley Academy different is the flexibility in the delivery of its courses. Students may join a small class or they can opt for private study, working individually with their teacher. This is most beneficial to the student who needs additional attention, or requires a flexible schedule.

Freemont is a private secondary school where students receive an enriching education in an empowering environment. School life is positive, stressing co-operation and constructive academic guidance with the mandate of realistically preparing students for university. The school day starts at 10:00 a.m. and consists of two longer class periods throughout the day, allowing for real learning - not just hurried "crowd control." With an enrolment of approximately 60 students, there is no back row at Freemont. Our small classes create a nurturing environment for students to take risks - and they do. In fact, they thrive. Freemont offers a focused, innovative learning experience that students will be able to take with them not only into university, but also into life. Freemont Academy's Principal is Sean Meggeson.

Your child can do well in math

What's the best way to help with school, raise marks and improve confidence? "Focus on current school work," says Sarah Rainsberger. "Why send high school students back to basics? They're just going to feel lost and confused sitting in class and doing their homework," explains Rainsberger, Director of Mostly Math Enrichment Centre in North York. "Our tutors focus on today's work so that your child can walk into the very next class feeling confident and ready to go. We fill in the gaps along the way, and the kids tend to catch up pretty quickly."

Mostly Math teaches mathematics to all grades including university Calculus, Algebra and Statistics. Instruction is one-on-one, tailored to the individual, from remedial to enrichment. Since math programs differ from school to school, tutors receive training on how to customize your child's learning experience. As a result, tutors can teach to match the specific expectations of your child's teacher.

Why Mostly Math? Most tutors have specialties in addition to math such as science, languages or the SAT. Tutoring in essay writing and editing is available, too. For more information, call 416-502-1717 or visit www.mostly-math.com

SF writer predicts demise of printed word in the mainstream

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

"I'm retiring in March." Normally that's not a startling statement, but when the potential retiree is only 34 years old, it's a telling one.

But Toronto-born writer Cory Doctorow has been doing so well in the writing field that he can afford to do just that. His third novel, Someone Comes to Town, Someone Leaves Town (TOR Books), has just come out, bearing the imprint of A Sci Fi Essential book, a SCI FI TV channel specially recommended book, the first from his publisher to be so designated.

Doctorow's short stories regularly turn up in the year's best science fiction and fantasy anthologies. He continues to make his mark with two much-praised blogs, or computer diaries, www.craphhound.com, which is his personal one, and as co- editor of www.boingboing.net, subtitled A Directory of Wonderful Things, which tackles worldwide issues and concerns.

And he's been making waves as the London-based, European affairs co-ordinator for the Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF), the position from which he intends to retire from. The EFF "was created to defend our rights to think, speak and share our ideas, thoughts and needs using new technologies, such as the Internet and the World Wide Web," according to the foundation's website.

Visiting Toronto for a book signing at the city's Bakka-Phoenix science fiction bookstore, where he worked for three years in the '90s, the voluble Doctorow displays an informed opinion on virtually any subject revolving around technology, science fiction and the future.

Unlike many other writers, however, Doctorow, who is no relation to the author E.L. Doctorow, doesn't exactly view the Internet with suspicion, preferring, in fact, to make all his novels available for free downloads by readers through something called Creative Commons licenses, now operating in 81 countries. "I give books away for free; it sells way more books," he insists, adding that many readers who've downloaded his books from their computers often go out and buy hard copies of his novel afterward.

For his first novel Down and Out in the Magic Kingdom, which postulated a future in which Disney's Magic Kingdom theme park has been taken over by several renegade groups who end up tampering with the place through technological manipulation, some 500,000 copies were given away, as well "as untold copies distributed by other people. That makes it one of the most distributed if not read [books]," he says.

This largesse hasn't significantly affected sales of his previous books in stores, even if, logically, fewer copies overall were sold, says Doctorow, pointing out that Down and Out in the Magic Kingdom has gone through an impressive five printings since its debut in 2003. (It also won him the prestigious Locus award for best first novel.) He compared notes with first novelists published at the time "and I perform well against them," he says proudly.

He doesn't understand why science fiction's old guard is so adamant in acting against what they would consider "Internet piracy."

Cory Doctorow

(Sometime science fiction writer Harlan Ellison settled out of court with AOL a year ago, after suing the company for copyright infringement for putting some of his work online without authorized permission.)

"The Science Fiction Writers of America [are] misguided; they have a snitch line," Doctorow says, adding that some writers have found a way of "'poisoning' electronic books, to 'degrade' them [after repeated viewings]. I don't think that an organization that is in the business of promoting science fiction should ever discourage people from reading it."

In any case, purveyors of the written book may not have much to protect in the future, says Doctorow. "I think that over the long term, the printed word will sunset as a mainstream activity.

"[We spend] more time reading off the screen than off pages. The question isn't whether books will disappear; the question is what will books turn into? The book will change form. We called things like the Bible a book even though it was a scroll; we called Gilgamesh a book even though it was cuneiform or clay tablets."

The problem, he says, is that too many people, in the SF world particularly, aren't prepared for the changes to come. "The boat is steering away from the pier and the response from many science fiction writers and other copyright-based industries has been to stand on the pier and shake their fist at it and my feeling is you should get in [the boat]. I don't know where books are going, but I do know that standing on the pier and shaking your fist at it, you'll miss the boat."

Doctorow concedes that much of his iconoclastic take on the world comes from the influence of his Trotsykist teacher parents. "I was a red-diaper baby; my parents were active in the Young Socialist League. I went to the Workmen's Circle and was bar-mitzvahed by [the] pacifist, anti- Zionist Rabbi [Reuben] Slonim."

His own political views are "very post-Marxist," he says. "I think the fundamental divide of the 21st century is centralized versus decentralized decision making, not social democracy versus planned economies or social democracy versus free-market economics. I believe in decentralized democracy, which I think characterizes the Internet very well."

His latest book, however, veers away from those technological prognostications. Doctorow's books have always had the touch of the absurdist about them – his second novel, Eastern Standard Tribe, dealt with people who communicate and in effect live through their computer connections and the common time zones they share outside the real ones of their home countries, but Someone Comes to Town, Someone Leaves Town takes it to the limit, with a hero whose father is a mountain, his mother a washing machine and his brothers comprising a set of Russian nesting dolls.

"[The novel], Doctorow says, is [also] much longer than my other two books together and the first to be set entirely in Canada. It has a larger cast of characters than I've ever handled in a book before and in general is just more complex than all the other books that I've done. It's much more of a journey, – it's not really meant to be read in one sitting the way my other books were."

One thing for sure, retiring from his main job at the EFF will mean he can devote hours to writing his fiction and non-fiction, instead of snatching precious time out of a normal day to write. "Most days I lose sleep or a meal or both and I travel three weeks a month. It's a good day when I get six hours of sleep and two meals. I'm retiring for that reason," he says.

Whatever he does in the future (he's finished 50,000 words, the first third of his next novel, tentatively titled Themepunks, a bit of a takeoff on the content of his debut novel, and will launch it onto an online magazine in the fall and also plans a non-fiction book on the entertainment industry) he won't, unlike writers such as Margaret Atwood, ever disavow the label of science fiction writer. "Being a SF writer was my goal from the age of 12, so I am proud and honoured to be called an SF writer. I don't think it's a ghetto; I have no objections to it [the label]."

Former Much Music vee-jay is now a Yummy Mummy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Erica Ehm, host and writer of Yummy Mummy, a weekly half-hour parenting television series on Life Network and Discovery Health Canada, describes a yummy mummy in no uncertain terms.

"She is a strong, powerful, multi-faceted woman who is a great mom," she says.

Ehm, herself the mother of Josh, 5, and Jessie, 20 months, says yummy mummies are great role models for their kids.

"Whether they are out working, or they are stay-at-home moms, they've made the right choice; they're doing what works for them."

With 13 shows completed, Ehm, well known for being the MuchMusic vee-jay for 10 years, says that Yummy Mummy, is not "your typical lifestyle show. There is the studio component, but there is also an animation component that turns the show into something magical and quirky."

In an episode about multi-tasking, she says, she is split into three, "because moms have to do three things at once."

In another episode, there is a woman walking upside down on the ceiling and then along the walls, "to show that since we had kids, we've done things we never dreamed we would do."

She created the show with local filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici and Meredith Caplan of Associated Producers. She also works closely with Gravity, an animation house from Israel that recently set up shop here.

She wants to empower women, she says, and let them know that when they become mothers, the rest of their lives should not disappear. "A happy mother makes a happy baby. Take time for yourself; you must feed yourself or you'll have nothing for your baby."

When she had her son, she says, she became desperate for adult stimulation, and slowly started back to work. She became head writer for What's Up Kids magazine and eventually came up with the concept for a parenting show for mothers.

"We've done pieces on getting ready to go back on work, healthy food, play date etiquette, allergies, temper tantrums, makeovers, choosing strollers, and in one piece we sent moms to a trapeze school because they needed a change and a challenge."

In her early 40s, Ehm, originally from Montreal, says she put off having children until she was sure she had met the right person. "I wanted to do it in a traditional way and I waited until I met, Terry [Moshenberg], who is truly a delicious daddy. He is a [loving]partner, and a father who is involved with his children.

"Delicious daddies are interesting men who help with the dinner and the diapers. We have a different generation of parents than our parents did. Women often work out of the house and the men need to carry their load. Our dads didn't have this kind of hands-on parenting. Our men have evolved."

How does she manage to be a full-time working mother? "I don't. I'm always a few steps behind. I forget to reply. to birthday party invitations, and I come home 15 minutes later than I expected, but when I do come home, I turn into Mom.

"My kids never lack for love and attention. When I'm with them, I'm there 100 per cent. When I'm not with them, I do what I have to."

It's necessary to live in the moment, because kids move very quickly to the next stage. she says. "In one episode I had my five year old son asking for the keys to the car. I just want parents to realize they shouldn't worry about what's coming up.. Enjoy yourself then and there. Your kids will feel it if you're distracted. They'll feel second best."

No house runs perfectly smoothly, she says. "That would be really creepy. You want your kids to challenge you. You want to build feisty, interesting, well-rounded people."

Ehm says that Yummy Mummy has been bought by Discovery channels in the United States, United Kingdom, Italy and France.

The show debuted in July on Discovery Health Canada and Life Network. It airs on Thursday evenings on Discovery and on Tuesdays and Thursdays on Life Network.

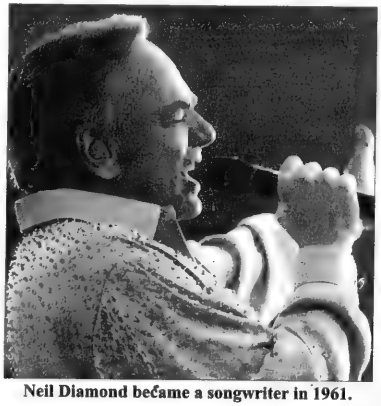
Neil Diamond brings Jazz Singer and more to Buffalo and Vancouver

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

Although it has been 25 years since singer Neil Diamond has starred in the remake of the film The Jazz Singer, the soundtrack to the film is still featured in his concerts.

Diamond's The Jazz Singer soundtrack album has sold more than six million out of the 120 million albums sold over his 40-year career.

Fans who wish to venture to Buffalo will hear Diamond sing the familiar songs America, Hello Again and Love on the Rocks from The Jazz Singer in addition to his other 35 Top 40 songs at the HSBC Center Aug. 24.



Neil Diamond became a songwriter in 1961.

Diamond will be making his only Canadian stop on his three-month U.S. tour in Vancouver at the GM Place on Sept. 22.

"The Jazz Singer is memorable as my first movie. I worked very hard to retell this classic story of a Jewish cantor who left his expected place in society for a world in show business," Diamond, 64, told the Chicago Tribune in 2005."I loved the retelling of the Jewish experience. So much of the story reminds me of my grandparents and their kind of life. They were immigrants to America and taught Yiddish to me as a child.

"I wanted Yiddish in this movie. In fact, I tried to convince the director at one point to have the whole opening in Yiddish with subtitles as they did [in Italian] in The Godfather. Yiddish is a beautiful language and I wanted to do my bit to keep it alive." Diamond's first language at home was Yiddish, taught to him by his late grandmother.

Although Diamond's biography is not retold in The Jazz Singer, there are many similarities to his life and that of the character Jess Robbins, who he portrayed. Diamond had battles with his parents when he told them he wanted a career in music.

Born in Brooklyn in 1941 to Akeeba and Rose Diamond, Neil Diamond's father was a dry-goods store owner and moved frequently to change locations. As a result, young Neil shifted from school to school and was often lonely and drew solace from music.

Music had a large role in the Diamond household, with Neil listening to big band hits of the 1940s, Gershwin, Berlin, classical music as well as traditional Yiddish material. Neil knew he wanted a career in music, but to satisfy his father's wishes for a stable career, he enrolled as a pre-medicine student at New York University, and was awarded a fencing scholarship.

"When I was 17, I did not know what I wanted to do as a career. My dad had his friend talk to me and when I told him I wanted to be a rock star, he and my dad looked at me like I was crazy, but it felt good to say that," said Diamond on Entertainment Tonight in 1986.

Diamond put music first, taking his first job as a songwriter for $50 weekly in 1961, and never looked back at a career in medicine, nor did he complete his undergraduate degree.

Diamond married his high school sweetheart, a Jewish schoolteacher named Jaye Posner, in 1963, and they divorced in 1969. They had two daughters, Marjorie and Elyn. In the late '60s, Diamond's stardom was on its way with his recording of Sweet Caroline and Solitary Man, but his family life was to suffer.

"For years, Jaye complained about the inordinate amount of time we were apart. It was almost as though our destiny was preordained. We were to be married, have children and the best we could hope for was a little house on Long Island. We'd live the lives our parents wanted to live. I wanted to remove myself from that peer group and wanted greater success than this," said Diamond to Alan Grossman in Diamond: A Biography.

Like Jess Robbins in The Jazz Singer, who found more success with the the gentile girl in show business (played by Lucie Arnaz) than his wife, Diamond courted Marcia Murphy, a production assistant at ABC television, and married her in 1969. Diamond's marriage with Murphy lasted 25 years. The couple had two sons.

"Marcia was my rock. I looked up to her as my source of inspiration. I honestly blame myself for the breakup of our marriage – and my marriage to Jaye as well," Diamond told Larry King in 2002.

Diamond now has three grandsons and relishes the time he spends with them.

Although Diamond has not labelled himself as religious, he has performed for Chabad, singing America at the 2002 L'Chaim To Life Telethon, and has donated funds to Hebrew University at a 2003 dinner in honour of Barbra Streisand (who he sang a duet with in the ballad You Don't Bring Me Flowers).

"I am Jewish. I believe in God, love the traditions I learned growing up, and tend to be very spiritual. I am not comfortable with organized religion, which is created by people who are fallible," said Diamond in Diamond: A Biography.

Diamond's music has stretched the boundaries from rock to folk to romantic ballads, with diverse songs such as September Morn to I Am I Said in his repertoire. He was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1995.

Diamond performs at HSBC Arena in Buffalo on Aug. 24. For more information, call 1-888-223-6000 toll free. He performs Sept. 22 at GM Place in Vancouver. For more information, call 604-280-4444.

Grassroots group promotes up-and-coming poets

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

If writing, reading or listening to poetry is your passion, then the Ontario Poetry Society (TOPS) is for you.

TOPS was registered as a not-for-profit literary association in October 1999.

The group's founder, poet and Thornhill resident Bunny Iskov, was a member of the League of Canadian Poets, but she felt that it only promoted established writers – "poets with books on the shelves at Chapters and Indigo," she said.

She felt that poets without published works needed an organization to serve their needs, and after doing some research, she discovered that there was no "grassroots" provincial poetry organization in Ontario.

Thanks to a one-page flyer inviting people to "join Ontario's only poetry organization," within its first year, TOPS had more than 60 members.

Today, almost five years later, there are 14 branches throughout Ontario and more than 160 members (including auxiliary members from outside of Ontario). The group also has a newsletter, which is published three times a year and contains members' poetry, news, information about markets, contests, topical articles and a recipe corner.

Throughout the year, members are invited to poetry readings at various locations, allowing them to promote their works and to gain inspiration and motivation from others.

"There is a kinship and bond through poetry," Iskov said.

In the last eight months, since the appointment of Shirley McCormack as president, TOPS has changed its look and become even more professional.

Originally, the newsletter was named We are T.O.P.S, but McCormack felt that it was too childish and that a more sophisticated name was needed, which is how the title Verse Afire came about.

As the newsletters have grown, so, too, have the organization's anthologies, with the latest being Unlocking the Muse.

Last year, thanks to a grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation, TOPS was able to produce Cherish our Heritage, a bilingual collection of Canadian poetry.

The organization's logo is a tree whose trunk is a person, and the TOPS slogan is "Grow a branch."

This year, TOPS held its first one-day poetry workshop in Cambridge, where lecturer and well-published author John Lee spoke.

Over the next six months, the society will be buzzing with activity.

At the moment, TOPS is running a poetry chapbook anthology contest called "Food for Thought" that is open to the public.

No previous prize-winning poems are permitted to enter, but published or unpublished poems up to a maximum length of 36 lines will be accepted, as long as the poet holds copyright.

The poems should focus on the delights of life, such as food, wine, music, romance, laughter, fun and beauty. The entrance fee is $2 for one poem and $5 for three poems.

The poet's identification should not be anywhere on the same page as the poem, to ensure blind judging, so poets should include a cover page with their full name and contact details. Deadline to enter is Sept. 30.

Prizes for the winners include money and two free chapbooks, which retail for $8.

For more information, visit the TOPS website at www.mirror.org/tops.

At the beginning of September, the Canadian Federation of Poets and TOPS will be co-host a "Great Outdoors Poetry Festival" in Burlington.

There will be mini-workshops, lessons and opportunities for participants to present their work. Admission is free and those interested can call 905-632-7796.

On Nov. 6 "Poetry, Pizza and Pizzazz" will be held at the Renaissance Cafe on Danforth Avenue. The $5 admission includes pizza, a door prize ticket and a gift for attendance. Attendees will hear poems by special guest poets Allan Briesmaster, Katerina Fretwell, John B. Lee and Elana Wolff.

The organization also sponsors the annual Ted Plantos Award, in memory of the organization's first life member, who died of cancer in 2001. This award of $100 in "seed money" is granted to a "starving but talented and deserving poet," Iskov said.

It's open to anybody of any age who has not yet published a full collection of poems– "just to help them to get their poetry out there," she said.

No one has applied so far for this year's award. All that is required is to submit a written request for the grant and copies of five to 10 poems before the Aug. 31 deadline.

In memory of Plantos, who Iskov describes as "an eclectic cook," TOPS published what Iskov calls a "literary gourmet" – a book of recipes and poems by TOPS members. The 2001 book contains a page with one of his recipes, submitted by his wife, May, and one of his poems, taken from his own published book.

For more information on the Plantos award, visit the TOPS website, or call Iskov at 905-738-0309.

CHAI TEA FEATURES
A CANTOR'S TALE

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival presents a "Chai Tea" afternoon with the screening of A Cantor's Tale and guest Jack Mendelson (the cantor) in attendance. The film, which was a hit at the festival, is a nostalgic and joyous exploration of one man's quest to pass on the authentic tradition of being a chazzan.

Sheppard Grande Cinema, North York. $15. Sunday, Sept. 18. Tea at 4:30 p.m., film at 5. Tickets 416-324-9121.

If you missed the festival's screening of the Italian Holocaust film The Hungarian Servant (subtitled), the festival and Capri Releasing are screening it again. Al Green Theatre, Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. $10. Tuesday, Aug. 23, 7 p.m. 416-452-1010 or www.caprifilms.com

TV Series on Biblical Archeology: In The Naked Archeologist, a documentary series to air soon on VisionTV, Toronto producer-director Simcha Jacobovici shows viewers biblical archeology like they've never seen it before.

Simcha Jacobovici

Shot on location in Israel, Egypt and Greece, the series probes biblical history in a way that is "fast, funny and irreverent," says the Emmy Award-winning filmmaker. "My goal is to demystify the Bible in general, and archeology in particular, to brush away the cobwebs and burst academic bubbles."

The Naked Archeologist airs on Mondays starting Sept. 5, 9:30 p.m., and repeats on Tuesdays starting Sept. 6.

Casting Call: Teatron theatre is seeking non-union actors and volunteers for two productions slated for the Leah Posluns Theatre next January and March.

Home of the Brave, by Arthur Laurents, is a fast-paced drama dealing with anti-Semitism in the U.S. army during World War II; the production requires six male actors between roughly 25 and 55. The Tenth Man, by Paddy Chayefsky, is a comedy about love, friendship and the supernatural, and requires a variety of characters, including several of advanced age.

Auditions take place early September. Contact Ari Weisberg, 416-781-5527 or teatron@sympatico.ca

Names in the News

• Toronto teacher-librarian Anne Dublin has won the 2005 IODE Violet Downey Award for her book, Bobbie Rosenfeld: The Olympian Who Could Do Everything (Second Story Press). The book, which celebrates the accomplishments of an all-around Canadian athlete, also picked up a Canadian Jewish Book Award in May.

• Jack Kuper's biographical work Child of the Holocaust, which has previously been translated into French, Italian, German, Polish and Japanese, was recently published in India in the Marathi language. It is therefore with a considerable sense of satisfaction that the Toronto writer-filmmaker recalls that some 20 New York publishers rejected his original manuscript in the '60s "with the excuse that it was too late after the Holocaust to attract a readership."

• A six-minute Tomorrow Campaign video produced by 12 Tribes Productions for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has won an Aegis Award. The video received first prize for its outstanding production quality in the category of sales-promotional videos. This is regarded as the video industry's premier competition for video productions and non-network TV commercials.

• Toronto comic Lou Eisen, who performed three evenings recently at Yuk Yuk's downtown, has worked as a contributing writer on The Tonight Show With Jay Leno and appeared in Cinderella Man with Russell Crowe. He is also the producer and host of the smash hit Yids in the Hall, an all-Jewish comedy showcase.

Arts in Brief

• The Civic Light Opera Company presents Flower Drum Song, the Rodgers & Hammerstein musical that first appeared on Broadway in 1958 and became a blockbuster movie in 1961. Songs include A Hundred Million Miracles, Love, Look Away, Chop Suey, You Are Beautiful and I Enjoy Being a Girl. Fairview Library Theatre, 335 Fairview Mall Dr. $20-$15. Sept. 1 to 17. 416-755-1717, www.CivicLightOperaCompanycom

• Lyn Carter "trolls the habitual roosts of perception, drawing on the commonplace and the mass-produced – objects that are plentiful yet, for the most part, invisible within daily life." "Incognito," an exhibition of Carter's work, is at the Koffler Gallery, Bathurst JCC, through Oct. 2.

• Would-be authors of Jewish children's books are invited to submit their manuscripts to the 21st annual Sydney Taylor Manuscript Competition of the Association of Jewish Libraries. A prize of $1,000 will go to the best fiction manuscript by an unpublished author for readers aged 8 to 11. The deadline is Dec. 31. Details at www.jewishlibraries.org

Israel & the Jewish World

Canadian held without trial in Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD and PAUL SHINDMAN
CJN Reporters

A former Montreal resident who was a known Kach activist before making aliyah two years ago will spend the next three months in an Israeli jail on suspicion he was planning to disrupt the Gaza withdrawal by attacking Palestinians.

Efraim Hershkovits, 22, was arrested and placed in administrative detention by Israeli defence officials without charges being laid last week after a recent attack by a Jewish extremist that left four Arab residents dead.

"The arrest order is for three months and will be reviewed after then," Israel Prisons Authority spokesperson Orit Shtelzer told The CJN, adding that the detention order might be extended at the request of the courts. Hershkovits is being held in the Ashmoret medium-security prison near Netanya.

Hershkovits and two other activists suspected of being associated with the outlawed Kach movement were arrested following the funeral of Eden Natan-Zada, a uniformed Israeli soldier who shot to death four Arabs on an Egged bus in the Israeli Arab town of Shfaram and was beaten to death by local residents after his ammunition ran out.

Natan-Zada had been staying at the Tapuah settlement north of Jerusalem, frequented by the three arrested men and known for having some radical elements.

The three are accused of planning to carry out attacks on Palestinians in a bid to disrupt the withdrawal of Israeli settlements from the Gaza Strip.

The order to apprehend the young men was made by Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz. Administrative detention is an extraordinary legal measure that allows suspects to be arrested without charge or making evidence public. It was the first time it has been used in connection with the Gaza disengagement.

One of the three, who held dual American/Israeli citizenship, opted to go back to the United States for 40 days.

Israel normally uses administrative detention with suspected Palestinian terrorists, but it recently started using the practice with what the authorities consider to be Israeli Jewish extremists. Using classified materials, the government can order the arrest without trial of persons suspected of illegal activity.

The Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv was unaware of any request to send an official to visit Hershkovits in prison, spokesperson Natalie Amar said.

The use of administrative detention with Palestinians has been condemned in the past by both human rights groups and Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler. The Ottawa office of the human rights organization Amnesty International issued a statement condemning the arrest without trial and called on the Israeli government to either charge Hershkovits and the two others and bring them to trial, or release them.

Hershkovits was born in Montreal and is the middle of three children. His family lives in the eastern Cote des Neiges district and prays at the Young Israel of Montreal synagogue. He graduated from Yeshiva Gedola of Montreal and attended Vanier College.

Hershkovits' mother Deborah told The CJN last Friday in Montreal that she has been unable to make direct contact with her son since his arrest.

Although he is strongly opposed to the disengagement from Gaza and has been involved in protest, she believes he would not have done anything illegal. She thinks he is being detained for his outspoken views and is concerned that Israel's democracy is weakening.

The information she and her husband George (Yehuda) have about Efraim is from their daughter Sarit, who made aliyah in the late 1980s, and their son-in-law, who live in Kiryat Ata, near Haifa. She said the authorities have told them he could be held for two months.

She said Efraim is not being allowed to make calls outside of Israel. "This bothers me a lot. I really, really would love to talk to him."

Asked if she had sought assistance from the Department of Foreign Affairs, she said she didn't know who to contact there.

She said as far as she knows, Efraim has not been mistreated, and has been allowed the strictly kosher food he requires and been given a hot plate that he can use during Shabbat.

She last saw Efraim in June when she visited Israel for the birth of a grandchild. Since he immigrated to Israel in July 2003, she said, she had spoken to him by phone nearly every day because he worked in an Internet cafe and had access to free long-distance calls.

She said he had not been in any trouble that she is aware of while in Israel, until now. "He is very opinionated and very vocal, and has taken part in a demonstration or two, but as far as I know, he would not hurt anybody. He's religious, a very gentle guy. I don't believe he would do anything illegal – he's smarter than that.

"I just came back from Israel June 16 and I found the situation very repressive… If you don't think the right way, they can be very, very harsh."

She said Efraim feels "very hurt" because "he loves Israel very much. He believes in his country… He gave up a good life in Canada, and now he is treated like this. This is not the way for one Jew to treat another."

She said she does not plan for now to go to Israel. "My son-in-law said it would not change anything. There is no point in going and we are not millionaires.

"I don't think Israeli security is going to listen to my pleas. I don't think Mofaz is going to tell me why he signed the [detention order]."

Efraim's 16-year-old brother Isaac said, "Of course, we are angry," but added, "We are not shocked. We knew something was going on."

Efraim led the Montreal chapter of the New Kach Movement, a spinoff off the Kahane Chai Movement, that is now on both the U.S. and Canadian terrorist lists.

A March 13, 2001, letter signed "Efraim Hershkovits/New Kach Movement" can still be found on the discussion forum of the Kahane organization's website chatroom.

The letter speaks of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassin Yigal Amir as a political prisoner, as well as of Margalit Har-Shefi, who was convicted of knowing of Amir's intentions; and of Avigdor Eskin, convicted of invoking a kabbalistic curse on Rabin before his murder.

"As we all know today in Israel several Jews are imprisoned for political reasons. Such as Avigdor Eskin, Margalit Har-Shefi, and Yigal Amir. Do we ever hear from the ADL or the UJC. I don't thinks [sic] so. This is why its [sic] our responsibility to bring this to people's attention. Just as Rav Kahane brought the plight of Russian Jewry to the world."

Wimbledon win a great career step for Levine

By IAN SADINSKY
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — "About the size of a kiddush cup – no, maybe a shot glass," is the way tennis sensation Jesse Levine describes the miniature replica cup he and partner Michael Shabaz received for winning the boys under-18 doubles championship at Wimbledon earlier this summer.

Unranked going into the world's most prestigious tennis tournament, Jesse and his partner beat some of the world's best junior players on their way to victory, despite their unfamiliarity with the famous British grass surface.

"At first we were at a bit of a disadvantage," said the Ottawa-born, Florida-based Levine. "There aren't a lot of grass courts in the United States, and the ball comes off the surface quickly, often at very strange angles."

Playing against a British and Australian pair in the finals, Levine and Shabaz quickly fell behind 0-3. But adjusting to the surface, the competition, and the sheer wonder of being at Wimbledon, the duo pulled their game together and won the championship in straight sets, 6-4, 6-1.

"Two things probably played to our advantage," said Levine. "First, our opponents had very little experience playing together. Michael and I met at a tournament in Tulsa last year and we've played a lot of doubles since then. Second, as a lefty, I was able to hit a lot of spins that other players hadn't seen before."

Mental toughness is also a big part of an elite athlete's makeup. Jesse has done a lot of psychological training with Wentworth Sharpe from Niagara Falls, who also works with a number of Canadian Olympic athletes. Clearly, the years of preparation paid off for Levine in the big match.

Also unranked in the singles at Wimbledon, Levine advanced to the quarter-finals, knocking off a number of seeded players along the way. He and partner Shabaz are now ranked number 1 in the world in boys under 18 doubles, and Levine has moved up to number 14 in the world rankings in singles for boys under 18.

Levine has been invited to play in both the junior singles and doubles at the U.S. Open in New York next month. Last week, he and Shabaz competed in Kalamazoo, Mich., in the U.S. Tennis Association national championships for boys 16 to 18 years old. The major prize is a wild card berth in the men's division of the U.S. Open. At The CJN's deadline, the pair had advanced to the tournament semi-final round.

"In the United States, you retain your junior eligibility until your 19th birthday, so a lot of 18-year-old guys who are already playing on the pro tour come to Kalamazoo trying to win the wild card spot."

Levine, who turns 18 in October, will still be able to play in U.S. junior tournaments until he's 19, but he would be ineligible for international play as a junior (e.g. at Wimbledon or the French Open) because international tennis has a different age eligibility limit.

Levine's 19th birthday will also be a pivotal date in determining a possible future career path in tennis.

With four credits left to finish high school (he studies through an online program run by the University of Miami), Levine has already been offered full scholarships to prestigious Ivy League universities such as Harvard and Princeton, as well as other schools such as the University of Florida in Gainesville.

Although the offers may be attractive to Levine, who lives with his parents Nate and Brenda and younger brother Daniel in Boca Raton, "I have until my 19th birthday to accept the scholarships." That leaves him more than a year to assess the advantages and disadvantages of going to school or turning pro.

In the meantime, Levine continues to work on his game at the world-renowned Nick Bollettieri Tennis Academy in Bradenton, Fla.

"A lot of pros come to the academy to sharpen their game. I've had a chance to hit some with Tommy Haas, Max Mirnyi and Mary Pierce." Pierce is a Bollettieri product, as are other greats such as Pete Sampras, Bjorn Borg, Andre Agassi, and Venus and Serena Williams.

Although tennis takes up much of his time, Levine loves to come back to Ottawa to visit with his grandparents Morris and Lillian Kimmel.

"It's unbelievable how the community has reacted to Jesse's accomplishments," said his beaming mom, Brenda. "People have been making donations in Jesse's honour to Hillel Lodge, where both of my parents are past presidents, and to other charities."

Levine is also proud of his years at Hillel Academy, and "J Lev" as he is known to his friends, is rapidly becoming a role model for local kids, along with Argo lineman and four-time Grey Cup champion – and Hillel grad – Noah Cantor.

While in London for Wimbledon, the Levine family was filmed for a documentary that retired tennis great Jim Courier is making on the lives of junior tennis players and their families.

But what about the miniature Wimbledon cup?

"Right now, it's sitting on top of my television set," said the affable and unassuming Levine.

Maybe one day he'll use it to make kiddush.

Maccabiah omissions and clarifications

In addition to winning a bronze medal in her age bracket (25-29), triathlete Shawna Novak earned a second bronze for finishing with the third fastest time overall, regardless of age, in the women's open category.

Three Jews take field for Bosox at same time

JTA

BOSTON, MASS. — Three Jewish baseball players took the field at the same time for the Boston Red Sox.

Gabe Kapler, Kevin Youkilis and Adam Stern all played the ninth inning for the Red Sox in their 11-6 victory last week over the Texas Rangers. The event will be recorded on a card in the second edition of a Jewish baseball card set, slated to be ready for Chanukah 2005.

More information about the Jewish card set will be available at Jewishmajorleaguers.org.

The 1946 New York Giants had five Jewish players on their roster, though it's not known whether all of theme ever played together on the field at the same time.

QB inducted into Pro Football Hall of Fame

CANTON, OHIO — Benny Friedman, who played quarterback in the early years of the NFL, was inducted earlier this month into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in Canton, Ohio.

Friedman is believed to have led the NFL in touchdown passes from 1927 to 1933, though statistics for the period are spotty. He was named to the National Football League's All-Time team in 1951.

His induction comes after a long campaign by those who knew Friedman as the football coach at Brandeis University from 1951 to 1959.

Raptors to host Maccabi Tel Aviv in exhibition

For the third consecutive year, the Toronto Raptors will host an international team as part of their eight-game preseason schedule.

The Raptors will welcome two-time defending Euroleague basketball champion Maccabi Tel Aviv to the Air Canada Centre on Sunday, Oct. 16. Maccabi has won five European club titles and finished second on six occasions. The club has won 45 of a possible 51 domestic league titles since 1954.

"We are excited to play host to a team with such a proud tradition," said Raptors general manager Rob Babcock. "They are returning many players from last season's championship team, which should make for an exciting contest."

Should CIBC execs return Enron-era cash?

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Can executive salaries be clawed back?

NHL players recently agreed to a salary roll back of 24 per cent as part of an agreement to get back to "work." However, shareholders of CIBC were not consulted for their approval to pay $2.4 billion to settle claims stemming from the bank's (alleged) involvement in the Enron fraud. At the same time, CIBC was doling out millions of dollars in bonuses to its CEO and executive team – a team that ended up costing the bank more than an entire year's worth of profits. Should investors be entitled to recover these bonuses, and perhaps even salaries, from those responsible for such shocking ethical lapses?

Unlike the corporate world, which is bottom-line oriented, Jewish ethics is predominately centred on intent. Results are ultimately in the hand of God, so ethically it's our effort that counts most. Therefore, an advisor who gives inappropriate investment advice for a particular individual because he receives a higher commission violates Jewish ethics even if the investment doubles in six months. Yet, an advisor who gives what he believes to be appropriate advice that turns sour is beyond reproach, notwithstanding the howls of protest from the innocent investor. Thus, a CEO who makes an investment decision with the best interests of the company in mind bears no financial burden, even if that investment costs the company millions of dollars. Who should have authority for such decisions is less an ethical question than a practical one.

However, if lawful investment decisions are made for reasons other than the best interests of the stakeholders involved, a grievous ethical wrong has been committed regardless of the ultimate outcome. As we humans are unable to truly establish intent – that is for God – Jewish courts can only deal with actual wrongs committed. While it may be immoral, it is not illegal to have ulterior motives. However, income earned in an underhanded way would be subject to claw-back. Thus, a bonus paid based on profits that then turn out to be non-existent should be subject to repayment. Therefore any bonuses – cash or stock – paid to executives responsible for the Enron debacle should definitely be returned to the company.

The appropriate resolution is less clear regarding salaries earned during this time. While many find the salaries paid to bank executives to be excessive in the extreme, they do not raise ethical issues in and of themselves. Jewish ethics regulates the manner in which money may be earned, but not the amount that is earned. In the private sector, market forces determine salaries – and excessive salaries allow the ethical executive to give "excessive" amounts for charitable purposes. High salaries may not come at the expense of paying workers a fair wage, and common sense dictates that wages be set up in ways that promote corporate harmony.

Jewish law distinguishes between employees and contractors, asserting that employees are paid for their time on the job and not for their work per se. Of course, the better their work, the more valuable their time becomes. Thus, while incompetence may allow an employer to fire a worker, it does not allow him or her to withhold pay. In practice, negligence may not be grounds for withholding pay. It seems to me that only salaries earned fraudulently would be subject to repayment. This would include time spent on illegal activities, or even activities that contradicted employees' given mandate. Thus, whether the CIBC executives should be forced to return their salaries depends on whether their activities can be shown to cross the line from incompetence to illegality.

POTATO CANDY

You won't believe how great these are!!!

- 3/4 cup mashed potatoes -- cold
- 4 cups confectioner's sugar
- 4 cups coconut -- chopped
- 1 1/2 teaspoons vanilla
- 1/2 teaspoon salt
- 4 squares baking chocolate (sweet or semisweet)

Mix potatoes and confectioners sugar together well. Stir in coconut, vanilla and salt. Blend well. Press into a large pans, so candy will be 1/2" thick. Melt chocolate over hot water, do not let water boil. Pour chocolate on top of candy, cool in refrigerator and cut into squares.

A glezel tay

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

How would one say "living in the moment," in Yiddish? Such a phrase does not likely exist, perhaps because in eastern Europe, with their concerns about such things as feeding little mouths and the whims of unfriendly neighbours, Jews had little time to savour the present.

There may not be a direct translation for this western concept, but a Jewish image does come to mind that conveys its meaning: a glezel tay, a glass of tea.

Oh, our glass of tea! There it sits, dark tan in colour, its steam wafting skyward, ready to be sipped by the exhausted tailor father or fatigued mother. The image is a powerful one in my mind and conjures up memories of stillness and contentment throughout my life.

A glezel tay. When I was growing up, it was prepared very simply, generally by my mother, who did so with expertise, fluidity and great care.

First, she would heat up the kettle (on Shabbat, we used a water urn), waiting for it to whistle that its content was boiling and ready to be used.

Folks have their own way of moving to the next step. Some will make sure that a spoon is placed in the mug, especially if it's glass – saying such things as "I remember when I was a child and my father's cup exploded from the heat." Personally, I have never experienced such a crisis, though I believe that it has happened to some people. But I concern myself little with this step.

In our home, it was customary to put the tea bag in the mug prior to pouring the hot water. This approach diverges from that of friends (some of whom came from other parts of Poland than my family) who would dangle the tea bag in the hot water. Not being a maven on tea tradition, I accept that either way is fine and can produce an acceptable glezel tay.

I have always been curious, however, about "leave it in" tea drinkers – those who let the tea bag steep, sometimes for minutes on end, allowing the water to get darker, and the bottom of the glass murkier. This is not my way. I like my tea mild – not too light and not too rich. Strong tea, to my palate, contradicts the essence of the drink – smooth and befriending. I do, however, subscribe to the adage that there is no right or wrong when it comes to taste.

Few "tea totallers," at least those I have met, begin drinking the prepared drink right away. Generally they sit, then sit a little bit more, watching the tea as it simmers down. This is unlike coffee drinkers, who frequently take a sip as soon as the coffee is ready, as though it is preparing them for the next moment.

It seems that tea is meant to be savoured and appreciated, and like a flickering bonfire, it acts as a conduit to living in the moment. Tea drinkers embrace their time with their cup of tea, as if it were a confidant, and they take the opportunity it offers to stop or slow down time.

This is even more evident on Shabbat morning when people imbibe their pre-shul glezel tay.

"Ahh, a mechiah," my zaide used to say after that first taste. For that moment, he was blissful, time was frozen, and he was able to measure his existence and hear his own heartbeat.

A glezel tay – a Yiddishe way of living in the moment.

Each cup of tea represents an imaginary voyage. – Catherine Douzel

Stakes high for Sharon

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

For better or for worse, Israel's withdrawal from Gaza and the northern West Bank is certain to be one of the defining moments of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's political career.

Sharon will be remembered as the Israeli leader who did the most to build settlements and then, when he became prime minister, tore them down.

But when the history books are written, will the pullout be seen as a bold move that saved Israel – allowing it to remain both Jewish and democratic – or as a wrong turn that divided the nation and exacerbated Palestinian terrorism?

Most Israeli leaders have defining moments associated with them. For David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, the most memorable was his decision to proclaim the establishment of the State of Israel on May 14, 1948, even though he knew it would lead to a war – one his generals said the Jews had only a 50-50 chance of winning.

Ben-Gurion was active before 1967, the watershed year in Israel's political history. Since then, Israeli history largely has been the story of a debate over how to use the territorial and psychological gains of the Six Day War to win Arab recognition of Israel's right to exist and achieve peaceful coexistence.

The right wing argued for holding on to conquered territories to maintain deterrence and to go for peace only after the Arab states recognized Israel. The left favoured offering to return most of the territories to spark a peace dynamic. Subsequent prime ministers are remembered largely for their contributions to this dialectic.

Torontonian leaves home in Gaza

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Shira and Avi Persoff's home in Gush Katif remains in immaculate condition, everything in its place as if waiting for its inhabitants to return from a day at the beach.

The fridge is fully stocked and the freezer is filled to capacity. The two-bedroom townhouse was left in its usual tidy state because, as Shira, a native of Toronto, puts it, she is something of a "neat freak."

Though the chance is remote that she, Avi and their young daughter Emunah (Faith) will ever return to their lives as they once were, she is holding out for a miracle.

Shira Persoff and daughter Emunah

She never for a moment thought that God would let it come to this – Israeli soldiers breaking down their door and ordering them out of the homes they had made in Gaza.

Right to the last minute, she expected some sort of divine intervention that would open the eyes of the Israeli political elite, particularly Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, and they would reverse the decision to evacuate the 9,000 Jewish settlers of Gaza.

It is an attitude common among her neighbours, Shira, 24, said in a phone interview.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Libman Bows Out

MONTREAL — Robert Libman, mayor of the Montreal borough Cote St. Luc, Hampstead and Montreal West and an ex-leader and MNA of the English rights Equality Party, said he won't seek reelection in the Nov. 6 municipal vote. Libman, 44, cofounded the Equality Party in 1989 and is a former Quebec regional director of B'nai Brith Canada. He said he is leaving politics to return to architecture, his original profession.

Vandal Charged

TORONTO — A leather-clad vandal drew a swastika and anti-Semitic phrases in chalk on the sidewalk in front of a shul on Bathurst Street south of Lawrence Avenue on Aug. 15 as a group of horrified Orthodox Jews looked on. Police arrived 40 minutes after a 911 call was made. Charged with three counts of mischief is Antoniu Marcu, 32, of Toronto.

WORLD

Pope Visits Shul

COLOGNE — Christians and Jews must guard against a resurgence in the kind of anti-Semitism that led to the Holocaust, Pope Benedict XVI said last Friday during a visit to a Cologne shul destroyed by the Nazis in 1938 and rebuilt after the war. His visit was just the second by a pope to a shul. His predecessor, John Paul II, visited one in 1986. The German-born Benedict prayed at a memorial to the six million Nazi victims, then heard Rabbi Netanel Teitelbaum say Kaddish and blow the shofar.

Pullout Protest at UN

NEW YORK — Hundreds of people rallied outside UN headquarters in New York Aug. 16 against the Gaza pullout. Their signs read: "Gaza surrender endangers lives and rewards terror." The rally was organized by the Israel Concert in the Park Committee and the Zionist Organization of America.

Plotter Arrested

LOS ANGELES — A Pakistani man was arrested for an alleged terror plot on the Israeli Consulate and other buildings around Los Angeles. Hammad Riaz Samani was picked up Aug. 2, Associated Press reported. The arrest came after an investigation was launched when police found a list of targets during a search of a robbery suspect's home.

Church Raps Barrier

ORLANDO — Another Protestant church has condemned Israel's West Bank security barrier. A motion passed Aug. 13 by the Evangelical Lutheran Church's assembly denounced the barrier for causing hardships for Palestinians and urged the denomination to play a role in "stewarding financial resources – both U.S. tax dollars and private funds – in ways that support... a just peace in the Holy Land," Associated Press reported. But it did not mention divestment from Israel or companies that deal with Israel.

Not Guilty Pleas

WASHINGTON — Two former American Israel Public Affairs Committee staffers pleaded not guilty to charges of passing classified information. Steve Rosen, AIPAC's exPolicy director, and Keith Weissman, a former Iran specialist for the lobby group, were in court last week and waived their right to a speedy trial. Larry Franklin, an ex-Pentagon analyst accused of giving the two men classified documents, also waived that right. A trial is set for Jan. 3. The men were set free without bail.

Theatre Gets Grant

NEW YORK — A Yiddish theatre in New York City has received a $1.5 million (US) grant from the city. The money given to the Folksbiene Yiddish Theater will help it find a permanent home, the New York Jewish Week reported this month. The theatre is in its 90th consecutive season.

Bush Foe Denies Saying Son Died for Israel

CRAWFORD, Texas — The mother camped out near U.S. President George W. Bush's Texas ranch denies she said her son, who died in the Iraq war, was killed to "benefit Israel."

Cindy Sheehan, whose son Casey was killed in Baghdad last year, reportedly told a Veterans for Peace conference this month that she would tell the president, "You get America out of Iraq, you get Israel out of Palestine."

Cindy Sheehan

The Republican Jewish Coalition, which compiled the quotations, says Sheehan has aligned herself with anti-Israel "peace" groups, and several Democratic lawmakers and activists have given her support.

The National Jewish Democratic Council questioned the authenticity of Sheehan's quotes and said she should not be seen as speaking for all Democrats. Sheehan recently told CNN that she didn't say her son died for Israel. "I do believe that the Palestinian issue is a hot issue that needs to be solved and it needs to be more fair and equitable, but I never said my son died for Israel," she said last week.

Montreal Jews demonstrate concerns over Gaza

Anti-disengagement rally criticized

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – An Orthodox rabbi who is well-known for his right-wing views on Israel severely criticized the organizers of a highly publicized outdoor rally last week against the disengagement from Gaza and the northern West Bank for being hypocritical and misleading.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko told The CJN that members of the Lubavitch community, who he noted were the event's primary organizers, should not publicly denounce the government of Israel, because, he said, the group is "anti-Zionist."

He also called print and radio advertising for the event "deceptive," because it did not identify the rally's sponsors, and because it stressed "unity and prayer" and gave no indication the main thrust would be to protest the disengagement.

"What kind of hubris can a group of people in the Diaspora, who view the creation of the State of Israel as a crime against God and His Torah, have [to be able] to take it upon themselves to attempt to dictate the security policy of the State of Israel or to a man like [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon?" Rabbi Poupko asked.

The anti-disengagement rally, held in Cote St. Luc's Pierre Elliott Trudeau Park on the day the pullout began, drew about 400 people from different segments of the Jewish community. Several speakers, mainly Lubavitch rabbis or adherents, affirmed that Gaza and "Samaria" are integral to Eretz Yisrael and warned of the dire consequences of ceding any part of biblical Israel to the "enemies" of the modern state.

One of the protest organizers, Rabbi Asher Jacobson of Congregation Chevra Kadisha, told The CJN that Rabbi Poupko's comments were unfair.

"This event is intended to gather as many Jews as possible to lend their voice of support to the Jews of Gaza who are being demonized and smeared in many quarters. This is a way of saying our hearts are in the East… It's a shame it is being turned into a Lubavitch or chassidic issue. Forty to 45 per cent of Israelis disagree with disengagement."

Rabbi Jacobson did not deny that Lubavitch is not Zionist, but he noted there are more than 1,000 Chabad institutions in Israel, and that the late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson met with all Jewish leaders, including Sharon, and encouraged Jews to go to Israel when it was being shelled by Iraq during the 1991 Gulf War.

While the anti-pullout rally was going on, Rabbi Poupko – along with fellow modern Orthodox rabbis Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem and Mordecai Zeitz of Congregation Beth Tikvah – held a concurrent gathering at his nearby shul, Congregation Beth Israel-Beth Aaron.

The brief, hastily called event drew less than 100 people – both for and against the disengagement, Rabbi Poupko said – for prayer and what he called "dignified" reflection on the course the Israeli government is taking.

Meanwhile, on the sidewalk beside Trudeau Park, approximately 20 chassidic men from the anti-Zionist sects Tash in Boisbriand, Que., and Neturei Karta, based in Monsey, N.Y,. stood with placards denouncing the State of Israel as contrary to Judaism.

A heavy police presence kept the anti-Zionist protesters away from the anti-withdrawal rally, and officers quickly removed one man who tried to tear a sign away from one of the Chassidim.

At the rally, Rabbi Jacobson said: "The message is that Montreal Jewry is opposed to any future unilateral concession that would weaken the security of the Jews of Israel or around the world."

The disengagement, he said, gives the impression that Israel is a country that "runs from terrorism and is amputating itself to the forces that wish to destroy it. While Americans are losing people every day in the fight against terrorism, Israel is surrendering."

Disengagement discussions

From the editor's desk

Great strength flows through Israeli society. We saw evidence of that strength in the fact that Israelis persisted in maintaining their everyday equilibrium during the near five-year campaign of suicide and other terror bombings unleashed against them in September 2000. Like the psalmist who proclaimed, "We shall not die, but live," they determined not to surrender their thoroughfares, streets, playgrounds and coffee houses to the assassins who exploited the openness of Israeli society.

The disengagement from Gaza and from the four northern communities in the West Bank was both a test and an affirmation of that strength.

Not every Israeli tracked the progress of the eviction process hour by hour. But every Israeli did indeed follow its progress day by day. Even if one preferred not to, it was unavoidable in this tiny, massively technowired, news-saturated, politically aggressive, emotionally intense society.

Yehezkel Dror

More than 900 news correspondents were in Gaza reporting on every unfolding detail of confrontation and compromise between the settlers and the eviction forces. No visual nuance went unrecorded nor any exchange of words unreported.

The CJN joined the large number of foreign correspondents in Israel last week but not to report on the myriad details of the disengagement. Those were available to the paper from our usual news sources.

Rather, The CJN met with a number of people whose work, inclination and experience are to look at the larger picture. What were some of the implications of the disengagement for Israel and the Jewish world, we asked them?

In summary, our conversations yielded the following very broad conclusions:

• disengagement was ultimately necessary;
• the wisdom of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral process, however, was questioned; and
• disengagement will cause Israel to refocus on key societal issues such as social cohesion and fine tuning its democracy.

Yehezkel Dror is professor of political science and public administration at the Hebrew University. His uncanny ability to see further down the road than most led to his recent appointment as the founding president of the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute, established by the Jewish Agency for Israel. The opinions he expressed were private and not those of the institute.

As difficult as the scenes of the disengagement were to observe, Dror said we must try to look past them to assess their impact.

He unambiguously supported Sharon's decision, but suggested the prime minister "did not receive the maximum payment for it."

Sharon was not forced to undertake the disengagement at this moment in time. The decision was not a function of ayn breira, namely, we had no choice. But Sharon changed his "basic mind set" regarding settling all of the Land of Israel.

Dror refused to speculate on the reason for the prime minister's change of mind, as many of Sharon's opponents were publicly doing. "We cannot second-guess the 'true motive' behind his decision. We have to assess our politicians by their behaviours, by their actions. Sharon, I believe, adopted a strategic, more long-range perspective."

Dror also rejected out of hand any suggestion that the process didn't conform to the rules of democratic government. Anyone who levelled the charge, really did not appreciate the varied nature and dynamics of parliamentary democracies.

"The Jewish people must support the value of law and order and the democratic integrity of the State of Israel. The right of protest must be ensured, but it must also be limited to conduct within democracy's rules.

"Disengagement is more than a turning point," Dror said. "It is a tipping point, a radical shift in Zionism and initiates a change in the outlook for all parties that settlement of all of the Land of Israel cannot be fulfilled."

He pointed out that if settling all of Israel is no longer viable, religious Zionists will have to reflect hard on their new, evolving roles. "Zionism will now have to provide compensating motives – a refounded Zionism – which would include new projects for our shared common values, among them rebuilding the Negev, the Galilee and Jerusalem."

It was too early, however, to make predictions about the long term peace process.

"The future depends largely on the Palestinians. Disengagement provides them with their third chance in the last decade (after Oslo and Camp David) to shape their own future.

"If Palestinians resort to terror, it will cause them serious damage. They are more vulnerable than they wish to admit. To the extent that they believe that the disengagement resulted because of Israeli weakness, they are deceiving themselves. Israel is not weak… The first obligation of the Palestinians is to ensure that there should be no terror.

"But if they act moderately, it will lead to more changes to their benefit. Conclusions at this point though," Dror said with marked emphasis, "are nonsense."

Even if disengagement goes badly, Dror was of the belief that it had to be tried. It was a reasonable step in the circumstances.

Uzi Arad

Uzi Arad is the head of the Institute for Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya. With extensive past experience in the Mossad, Arad's expertise is unequivocally in matters of national security.

He echoed Dror's observation regarding the unilateralism of disengagement, but in much harsher language describing it as "an extremely flawed policy. It was sloppily conceived and will create new problems."

He elaborated.

"When Sharon initially announced the plan, he glorified the unilateral aspect of the pullout. But very quickly, the U.S. put conditions on the prime minister's unilateralism, namely, Israel had to perform all the obligations within the 'road map' [peace plan], cultivate Abu Mazen [Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas] and talk to the Europeans.

"Thus, Sharon's unilateralism quickly disappeared."

But it wasn't the loss of Sharon's control over the initiative that most bothered Arad. It was the precedent, according to Arad, Sharon established.

"Two principles have always governed Israel's approach to [negotiating] peace with the Palestinians: [i] give and take – the classic formula of Security Council Resolution 242 – and, [ii] leave to the very end, Phase 3 of the 'road map,' the question of the removal of large settlements. This way Israel could maintain more leverage in the negotiating process."

"But Sharon has drastically broken both of the negotiating principles. He conceded large chunks of territory for nothing, and he removed a large bloc of settlements now, not later."

When asked why Sharon had departed from past precedent, Arad could only speculate, as others also have, that perhaps it was " a panicky reaction" to the cumulative effect of the generally positive response to former Knesset member Yossi Beilin's Geneva peace initiative, the worldwide condemnation of Israel and of the prime minister personally."

Ministers reject Elmasry claims about advisers

By JANICE ARNOLD
and PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporters

Two senior cabinet ministers have rejected a suggestion by a Canadian Muslim leader that they remove a pair of Jewish advisers for being too "pro-Israel."

Spokespeople for Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew and Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Public Safety Anne McLellan said they had full confidence in the ability of the two advisers to advance views that are in Canada's best interests. They said there is no basis for the stated concern that the interests of Canada's Muslim population would be harmed by the appointments.

In an Aug. 15 news release, the Canadian Islamic Congress said the appointment of Jonathan Schneiderman as Pettigrew's Middle East adviser and of former senator Leo Kolber to chair a new advisory council on national security matters "could herald bad news for Canada's 750,000 Muslims."

The two ministers should re-examine the "two new Liberal appointments. Strong pro-Israel voices in foreign affairs and national security [are] making Canadian Muslims' 'nervous,'" the group said.

"With the Muslim community's vulnerability to negative attention since 9/11 – a situation exacerbated by last month's 7/7 bombings in London – there is understandable nervousness at the news that two of Canada's most active supporters of Israeli domestic and foreign policy will now have key voices in Canadian security and foreign policy decision," said Mohamed Elmasry, the group's national president.

He called for more suitable candidates to fill the positions, which he said require "a broader, less partial and more equitable approach to the welfare of all Canadians."

Alex Swan, McLellan's communications director, rejected the contention that Muslims should be worried about Kolber's appointment.

"The suggestion that Muslims should be concerned is groundless and that kind of language is not helpful at a time when we're trying to promote dialogue between communities," Swan stated.

Jamie Christoff, a spokesperson for Pettigrew, said that "[Schneiderman's] advice to the minister has always been balanced and educated and his professional conduct has been beyond reproach."

He also noted that, contrary to Elmasry's assertion, Schneiderman is not the minister's adviser on the Middle East. That post is held by Jim Anderson, while Schneiderman serves as senior adviser with a specialty in Canada/U.S. relations.

"But he also provides valuable input on the Middle East file, as do others in the office," Christoff said.

Kolber, 76, refused to comment directly on Elmasry's comments, except to suggest they must be viewed in light of the Muslim leader's remarks on television more than nine months ago. As a panelist on the Michael Coren Show on Crossroads Television System last October, Elmasry argued that terrorism against all Israelis over 18 is justified since they are eligible to serve in the army.

"Just check on the man who said them. I don't remember the exact words, but he was basically urging the killing of [Israelis]," Kolber said.

Kolber has been a strong supporter of Israel since its inception and a close friend of Shimon Peres for 55 years. Kolber's son, daughter-in-law and grandchildren live in Israel.

However, he has also publicly disagreed with policies of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government. At a B'nai Brith dinner in his honour in December 2003, he criticized the Israeli government's reprisals against Palestinian civilians, the settlement policy and the security wall.

Schneiderman, 43, would also not comment on Elmasry's claims. "I don't think my comment would help in any way… I'm not the spokesperson for foreign affairs."

Schneiderman, who had previously served as a special assistant to Prime Minister Paul Martin, said his position with Pettigrew's department has not changed since his appointment in September 2004 as senior adviser to the minister.

Involved in the federal Liberal party since the late 1970s, Schneiderman has been active in the Jewish community and until recently served as president of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal. He is also a past regional director of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, a former spokesperson for the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, and the manager of Thomas Hecht's unsuccessful bid for the national presidency of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Jewish groups reacted angrily to Elmasry's statement, suggesting it was a thinly veiled effort to keep Jews out of key positions because of their religion.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, the community's main lobbying arm on Israel, said Elmasry's views "are as offensive as they are illegitimate. It recalls the opposition to the appointment of Norman Spector as ambassador to Israel, as if the fact he's Jewish disqualifies him from his responsibilities of doing his duties and advancing Canada's interests."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said Elmasry's comments resemble anti-Semitic claims that "Canadian Jews have no loyalty or integrity and would abuse their status by subverting Canada's well being in favour of conspiracies and plans that favour Jewish or pro-Israeli interests."

Adler noted that after his controversial TV remarks, Elmasry, a professor of engineering at the University of Waterloo, apologized to the university for conflicting with the school's values. The university accepted Elmasry's apology. He suggested that the public petition the university and other professional institutions where Elmasry is a member "to denounce him and refuse to allow him to continue as a member."

West Wing's Malina to help launch UJA Federation campaign

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Joshua Malina's first day of work on the set of the West Wing, where he plays White House speech writer Will Bailey, fell on Rosh Hashanah. Malina chose to observe the holiday instead.

"Being Jewish is really important to me in a daily way," the 39-year-old actor said last week in a phone interview from his home in Malibu.

Career and religion began to intersect for him four years ago when he became a regular on the Jewish speaking circuit. On Sept. 1, he will talk about "Being Jewish in Hollywood: A Look Behind the Scenes" at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2006 campaign launch at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel. Israeli musician David Broza will perform at the same event.

In 2001, Malina took part in a Los Angeles rally supporting Israel. He was very disappointed – "appalled," he said – at the dearth of Jewish celebrities on the dais, and said so in an interview with the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles that kick-started his Jewish speaking involvement.

The rally, he said, "wasn't really a political event. Israel has a right to exist. It wasn't about supporting [Israeli prime minister Ariel] Sharon or [a particular] government policy."

Malina – who is also passionate about poker and is executive producer of Celebrity Poker Showdown – said he has many friends and colleagues "whose inclination is in support of Israel, but who sometimes feel a little cowed, or daunted, by the type of things they hear that are critical of Israel."

He feels it's important to become educated about Israel. "Anyone with any kind of sophistication realizes it's not black and white. There's a way to care about Israel and still have opinions about what's going on... Let's start from the point that Israel has a right to exist in a peaceful way."

Malina, who majored in theatre at Yale University, expressed some hesitancy about his role as a spokesperson – he's an actor, not a Middle East affairs expert, he pointed out. But, he said, "for better or worse," people will seek out his opinions because of what he does for a living. "I've realized that there's an up-side. I have an opportunity to support Israel in a public way."

A Jewish day school alumnus who grew up in New Rochelle, N.Y., Malina and his wife, who have two young children, keep a kosher home and put up a sukkah at Sukkot.

Joshua Malina

Their lifestyle is not incompatible with his career, he said. "We don't live a very Hollywood lifestyle." On the few occasions he has had a conflict with a Jewish holiday, his employers have always accommodated him, he said.

In June, Malina visited Israel with his father. He said he felt comfortable immediately. It was his first trip there in 11 years, and he figured it was time to put his money where his mouth is, as he put it. Although others were concerned for his safety, he said that if he made it to the Los Angeles airport, he would have made it through the most dangerous part of the journey.

CIC Advocacy poster competition deadline set for Sept. 30

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

With the deadline fast approaching, Canadian residents aged 14 and up should be doing the touch ups on their posters for the Canada Israel Committee (CIC) Advocacy's poster competition.

Posters can be in either French or English, hand-drawn or computer generated, but entrants should focus on finding a fresh image of Israel that is both thought provoking and visually engaging.

Posters may highlight the common values of Canadians and Israelis or showcase Israel's innovations and contributions to the world.

A jury composed of four judges appointed by the CIC will review all the entries received.

The jury will be composed of a communications specialist, journalist, university professor and representative of State of Israel Bonds Canada. The jury, in its sole discretion, will select the winning entries from all eligible entries submitted based on technical ability (25 per cent), originality (25 per cent), strength of message (25 per cent) and creative/artistic merit (25 percent).

The entry must be an original work and must not have been entered in any other competition. The entrant must be the exclusive owner and have all rights, title and interest in and to the entry. Should the entry include the image of a person or persons, such person or persons shall have authorized the use of his/her image.

The top 25 entries will be awarded a copy of the newly published book Israel in the World: Changing Lives Through Innovation.

The prizes for the top three are courtesy of State of Israel Bonds Canada and include $1,000, $500, and $250 (all amounts in U.S. dollars) for first, second and third prizes consecutively. In the event the Israel Bonds are not available, State of Israel Bonds Canada will provide a prize of equivalent value.

The winning poster will also be published in The Canadian Jewish News.

The deadline for entries is Sept. 30, 2005 and all entrants must clearly state their name, age (if under 18), permanent home address, phone number and e-mail address and send their entries to: CIC Advocacy Poster Competition, 100 Sparks St., Suite 600, Ottawa, Ont. K1P 5B7. Or e-mail: postercompetition@cicweb.ca

For a complete breakdown of the rules, entrants can log onto www.cicweb.ca/postercompetiton.

Now, the PA's turn

The border to Gaza had been closed to Israelis barely hours before some of the editorialists in the international media began to hector Prime Minister Ariel Sharon about his further responsibilities to the peace process. Gaza was merely the first step, intoned the editorial in the International Herald Tribune (published by the New York Times), Tuesday, Aug. 16.

"Sharon should be cheered for taking this step. But he must also be forewarned: if there is to be any chance for peace, there are many more steps that must be taken."

That the Tribune's editorialist could "forewarn" the Israeli prime minister about the country's future, even as Israelis hovered on the brink of a potentially wide societal precipice was uncharitable, to say the least. Some might say it was an affront to common decency.

Merely three days later, with the tearful images of the unfinished disengagement still pressed into the hearts of all Israelis, the Tribune decided to drive its hectoring point home further with a lead editorial titled "Gaza reality check": "But it's past time – 38 years past, to be exact – to give the Palestinians there a chance at a better life."

One editorial during the painful week may have been condescending. Two were simply mean-spirited. They were also devoid of any fair-minded, balanced historical context. And the effect of the editorials was the familiar and ultimately dangerous message that we have heard for so many years.

In defiance of all the facts, they exculpate the Palestinian leadership for any part of the Palestinians' past misery in Gaza. And they effectively absolve that leadership of any responsibilities towards the Palestinians' future.

In his address to the nation last week, Sharon understandably, and most would agree reasonably, placed the burden for the next step of the peace process on the Palestinians. "The world awaits the Palestinian response – a hand offered in peace or continued fire. To a hand offered in peace, we will respond with an olive branch. But if they choose fire, we respond with fire, more severe than ever."

Israel's disengagement from Gaza may indeed be only "the first step." But it now falls to the Palestinian Authority to take the next step. Mahmoud Abbas, the leader of the PA, must prove that the PA can govern Gaza according to the norms of civilized government, namely with the rule of law and control over its armed forces.

The future of the peace process depends very clearly now upon the Palestinian leaders. No amount of mean-spirited moralizing by distant western editorial writers can change this.

Honour sacrifices made by settlers

Once the dust of the disengagement has settled, there should be a national holiday declared to honour the settlers, who, in some cases, sacrificed their lives to follow the call of Zionism in its true pioneering spirit.

These settlers did no wrong – they settled on land that was given to them by the government and they broke no laws by settling in Gaza.

Former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin gave back land to get peace and now Prime Minister Ariel Sharon gives back land to get security. Hard as it is to accept, in the future the sacrifices made by these settlers will be appreciated as their children will hopefully live in an Israel that is stronger and more secure and, most important, they will live in peace.

Gerber selective on gay marriage

Jean Gerber's column on gay marriage attempts to twist the Torah to suit her concept of what is important ("What we should really worry about," CJN, Aug. 11). She mentions that the Torah condemns homosexuality, but then attempts to negate that prohibition by claiming that "the world of then… is not the world of now," and that the references in the Torah on this matter are small. She claims that admonitions that we pursue justice and "care for the widow and orphan" and social needs are mentioned "a thousand thousand times" more in the Torah. She says, "That is where Judaism, rabbinic ethics and our own moral centre should be focused, not on whether Jules marries Jim."

If Gerber chooses to use the Torah and the Jewish prophets to support her views on social justice, she can't select the parts of the Torah that support her views and belittle or ignore those that do not. The Torah is the word of God. Yes, the Torah deplores social injustice and oppression of the poor. But it also condemns homosexuality. It's a package deal.

Federal gov't and Jewish education

I believe The CJN missed an important opportunity to bring up an issue of vital importance to the Jewish community in the interview with Canada's minister of social development, Ken Dryden ("Dryden defends gov't record on Israel, day care," Aug. 18). The issue of discrimination against religious minorities in education funding is a federal responsibility as a result of a United Nations Human Rights Commission finding that the province of Ontario discriminates by being the only jurisdiction in the free world that funds one religion (Catholic) to the exclusion of all others. As a signatory of the International Covenant on Civic and Political Rights, the federal government is required to correct findings of human rights violations, which our government has failed to do.

By failing to bring this issue to the attention of our politicians, The CJN sends the message that this discrimination is acceptable. We need to bring this up repeatedly so that Jewish education will be within the reach of all members in our community. A great disservice was done to the many members of our community who want to give their children a Jewish education but can't afford it.

Response to young offender's letter

Are we to feel sorry for this young offender ("Young offender's apology," letter, CJN, Aug. 11) because we now realize how ignorant he is both in spelling and actions? If he is truly repentant, and who am I to judge, he must be forgiven because that is my faith.

The poor fellow says he "didnt know the history behind your peoples sufering" and that he intends to fight "against hate instead of promoting hate." It's incumbent upon us to help him achieve his righteous goal and provide him with the education he is so sadly and surprisingly lacking. Invite him to attend Holocaust Education Week and offer him the opportunity to do community service in the Jewish sector.

Response to Miller

I find it astonishing that The CJN would publish Frank Miller's letter, filled with such remarks as "the fundamental aims of Islam[are] world domination and the destruction of the Jewish entity, among others" (Aug.18). Miller over-generalizes throughout, placing all Muslims and indeed Islam itself into one and the same category.

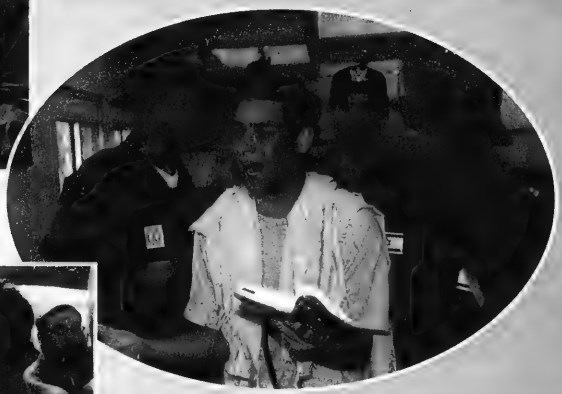
Settlers say goodbye to Gaza



As the pullout began from Gaza last week, Israeli reaction took many different forms, from quiet acceptance to loud protest.

Extreme makeover, soul edition

I haven't had plastic surgery – yet. I've managed to hold out, despite a barrage of TV shows promising salvation by scalpel.

Actually, I have no problem with plastic surgery. An improved physical appearance can improve one's job prospects and possibility of marriage. Cosmetic surgery is just another example of human ingenuity enhancing quality of life.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

However, society's fascination with plastic surgery is exaggerated. The aforementioned shows breathlessly tout plastic surgery as a vehicle for personal redemption. Attractiveness is seen as being next to godliness. Aspirations of the soul, such as identity and meaning, are now fulfilled through liposuction. Unfortunately, this is absurd: plastic surgery is, by definition, skin deep.

I'm not naive: I know you won't see a TV show featuring rabbis performing advanced Torah implants or prayer lifts or charity peels anytime soon. That's a shame, because our souls can get just as torn and worn as our bodies. Years spent in the dog-eat-dog work world, coupled with excess consumption, can erode even the most spirited youthful idealism. Cynicism and the pursuit of comfort can transform idealists into sarcastic, brandy-sipping, golf-playing sellouts.

So how do former idealists get their souls back? With an extreme makeover for the soul.

Soul makeovers come in many different varieties. Sometimes you need to go on the road. Comfortable environments can lead to spiritual decay. You need to leave home in order to challenge your soul again. Find an appropriate spiritual retreat and break away from the daily grind.

Sometimes, you need to just do it. We all say we want to spend more time with family, volunteer more and study more. But on any given night, it's too hard because we're tired, had a rough day at work, or need to take care of some errands. Our great goals end up sliding away, one night at a time. So just do it!

Sometimes, you need to go home. There is an amazing amount of spiritual insight in our own backyard. Yet we ignore this treasure and search for fool's gold. It astonishes me that some Jews, with the oldest and most influential religious tradition in the world, still run after every bizarre new fad. The best place for a soul makeover is at home.

A member of our synagogue travelled with me on a trip to Israel. It was his first visit, and he was overwhelmed by what he experienced. The history, religion and culture transformed his entire outlook on life. At the end of the trip, he said: "Before coming to Israel, I was of the Jewish faith. Now, I'm a Jew."

This is what a spiritual makeover is all about. You just do it – break away from the old grind, then return home. You end up with your life transformed, and even with a more beautiful soul.

It's time for others to defy conventional wisdom

This past spring, a sign at my children's Jewish school proclaimed: "Wanted: Settlers." Shocked by this bold political statement in a moderate, apolitical environment, I looked closer. My daughter's Grade 4 class projects were celebrating 19th-century pioneers who settled North America.

Gil Troy in Montreal

This summer, people watching events in Israel have experienced a similar play on their perceptions. Israeli settlers, frequently caricatured as gun-toting hooligans, have been protesting angrily but denouncing violence repeatedly. When one Israeli army deserter murdered four Israeli Arabs, not only did the settler movement repudiate him, the leaders of the settlement where he had lived refused to bury his body there.

Media caricatures of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon have proved equally inaccurate. Long denounced as bloodthirsty, long cheered by settlers as their champion, Sharon infuriated the settlers and charmed the world with his plan to leave Gaza. He even enjoyed a warm Parisian reception from French President Jacques Chirac, after a sustained Gallic chill.

Israeli democracy itself has proven more resilient than expected – and less explosive than its caricature suggests. While Israeli police have been lamentably heavyhanded with some dissenters, and some "orange" fanatics were violent and treasonous, numerous peaceful protests took place – 30,000 people protested at Kfar Maimun, 100,000 prayed against disengagement at the Western Wall and 150,000 gathered in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square. The anti-disengagement forces can mourn their campaign's outcome, but they have been heard – as they should be.

Ads on buses in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem have urged Israelis: "Let's just make sure we don't disengage from each other." Despite the intense debate, judging by the festive, summertime atmosphere on Israel's streets, thus far, the rule of law has held and democracy has triumphed. Israelis remain passionately engaged, sometimes enraged, but not violently estranged from each other.

Alas, while Israel defies conventional wisdom – to its credit – its neighbours and allies behave all too predictably, and destructively. Rather than using Israel's Gaza departure to evolve from demagoguery to statesmanship, from terrorism to diplomacy, from targeting a viable democratic neighbour to building a stable democratic state, Palestinians have continued to attack Israel rhetorically and militarily.

Forgetting that Israel won the war and defeated their "intifadah" by demonstrating collective civilian grit and creative military effectiveness, the Palestinians have continued launching rocket attacks, attempting terrorist incursions, and demanding Israel's destruction.

True, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas appears moderate when compared to his predecessor Yasser Arafat, but experts debate whether Abbas is too impotent to control terrorism or, like many of his colleagues, too addicted to the Palestinians' culture of terrorism. Regardless, Hamas seems ascendant among Palestinians, with extremism and terrorism continuing to eclipse moderation and compromise.

World leaders, remaining true to form, are feeding Palestinians' addiction to terror. Canada, the United States and the Europeans are pumping billions of dollars into the Palestinian Authority without guaranteeing that the money will not be diverted once again to evil terrorists' coffers or corrupt leaders' Swiss Bank accounts.

Even U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has pressured Israel to concede ever more to the Palestinians, arm them with more weapons, and act with a generosity and restraint that no other country is expected to display. Instead, she should warn the Palestinians that they should not greet the Gaza withdrawal with a resurgence of terror, or they will suffer the consequences.

World leaders, who for years have been demanding an Israeli withdrawal from territories, can help during this delicate time. If the United Nations and the West proclaimed that zero tolerance for terror worldwide includes Palestinian violence, and that Israel will be encouraged to retaliate aggressively if even one mortar falls or one suicide bomber "succeeds," the message would be clear: the world community wishes to encourage progress in the Middle East.

By remaining silent, world leaders implicitly empower Hamas, as well as demonstrate their typically one-sided disdain for Israel, and they wait for the disengagement to fail so they can blame Israel. Every Palestinian rocket launched and every terrorist attack attempted bolsters the critics of Sharon's gamble to redraw the regional map and find stability, if not peace.

This summer, the settlers and their fellow Israelis have defied conventional wisdom and behaved better than most observers imagined they would. Now, it's the world's turn. In fact, such farsighted and balanced moral leadership from Canada, Europe and the UN is long overdue.

Israel's other matsav

You will often hear Israelis refer, with exasperation or despair, to the matsav – literally "the situation." They use this term to refer to the ongoing conflict between Israelis and Palestinians, and, more broadly, to tensions among different factions in Israel regarding this conflict. There is an urgency to discussions about the matsav, because it pertains to the survival, continuity and self-definition of the country.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

But there is another matsav – another situation – this one internal and domestic, but no less crucial to the country and its inhabitants. Somewhat differently, but no less importantly, this other matsav, too, pertains to the survival, well-being, and identity of the Jewish state.

Even today, as media attention is focused almost exclusively on Israel's wrenching disengagement from the Gaza Strip, it does not take long for Israelis to begin discussing, in worried tones, the other matsav: profound internal social problems that threaten the morale of citizens and the moral fibre of the country – problems we tend to associate with North American inner cities, not the bucolic Holy Land.

Violence in schools is on the rise. Teachers have told me that even in good schools and in decent neighborhoods, students bring knives to class. One teacher in Be'er Sheva told me that at the local high school, two girlfriends began arguing over a boy they both liked. Finally, one of the girls pulled a knife from her shoe and stabbed her friend several times.

"Can you imagine?" the teacher said to me. "A knife! In her shoe!" Such incidents are not isolated, I am told repeatedly, but symptomatic.

The teachers I spoke to blame large class sizes and the challenges of new waves of immigrants. But they stress that such violence – including youth gangs – is not simply an "immigrant" problem, but one that also involves native-born Israelis. They cite a growing cynicism among the youth, as well as their sense of corruption at high levels and a general level of tension in the country, as affecting the students they teach.

As vast financial resources have been directed to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and its fallout, school budgets have shrunk. In recent years, funding for schools and after-school programs has dried up. Many schools have been forced to cut out parts of the curriculum that are not seen as vocational and pragmatic. Thus, literature, art and music have been eliminated from many schools. Such budgeting is short-sighted, as it's precisely these areas that can help students learn to reflect upon, express, and work out the conflicts and tensions under which they live.

And problems are not only evident among the youth. Domestic violence is up, and more and more you read of people going outside the law to resolve their issues. People also complain about the uncertainty of the future and what they see as the government's intrusion on basic freedoms.

In discussions with Israelis across political and ideological lines, the other matsav keeps surfacing. Right, left and centre, Israelis speak in terms of a battle for the national soul, although they sometimes disagree on some of the symptoms and the elements of a solution. Some speak of a return to basic Jewish values, others to further democratization of a pluralistic society, and still others of the need for both.

Yet it's clear that a wide spectrum of Israelis agree on much of what is problematic in their society. Amid the divisive issues that they contend with, these tough domestic issues present an opportunity to join forces and forge a renewed sense of national purpose, thereby strengthening the social fibre of modern Israel.

Although ideological opponents may sometimes be hard-pressed to acknowledge it, there is a commonality to many of their concerns that may yet open up a path for national unity, even in the midst of ongoing political differences on other matters. Supporters elsewhere should help this effort, rather than focusing on the hard issues that divide left from right, blue from orange.

Funding is needed for schools and youth programs, and better resources for those seeking shelter from violence. This, more than the exact contour of national boundaries, will determine the survival of the Jewish state in a meaningful way.

The Kirshner File

Palestinian property claims: a touchy issue

If Israel and the Palestinian Authority ever reach the point where core unresolved issues can be discussed seriously and at length, the toughest one probably will be the festering Palestinian refugee problem.

Sheldan Kirshner in Toronto

Approximately 700,000 Palestinian Arabs left their villages and towns in what is now Israel from late 1947, when the United Nations passed a historic Palestine partition plan, through 1948, when Israel declared statehood and the first Arab-Israeli war erupted. Some Palestinians departed voluntarily, expecting to return after the fighting died down. Still others were driven out by Jewish militias and the Israeli army.

The refugees, who largely fled to neighbouring Arab countries, left behind land, homes and factories. Their properties doubtless helped Israel absorb a wave of new Jewish immigrants. The Israeli government promised to compensate the refugees for their losses, but compensation never took place, mainly because this highly charged subject became enmeshed in the thorny political dimensions of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

From the outset, Israel insisted that the plight of the refugees could not be settled unless Jewish refugees from the Arab world were also compensated. Israel claimed that compensation was part of a wider peace process under which Arabs would accept its existence and place in the region.

Convinced that Israel was born in sin, and reluctant to embrace it as a neighbour, the Arabs countered that the flight of Arab Jews had been voluntary, and that the Palestinian refugee problem was a humanitarian one that lay outside the bounds of politics and could only be solved with the mass return of the refugees to their original homes.

Cognizant that the "right of return" would eventually alter its fundamental character and reduce it to a non-Zionist binational state, Israel rejected Arab demands for the unrestricted flow of Palestinian refugees into its territory. To this day, Israel's position remains the same.

These critical differences have created an impasse of immense proportions that may yet foil all well-meaning efforts to defuse the dispute.

Michael Fischbach, a professor of history at Randolph-Macon College in Virginia, has stepped into this minefield with an important book, Records of Dispossession: Palestinian Refugee Property and the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Columbia University Press).

In the course of his research, Fischbach delved into the Central Zionist Archives and the Israel State Archives in Jerusalem, the British Public Records Office in London, the United Nations Secretariat archives in New York, the United States National Archives and Records in College Park, Maryland, the Jordanian National Library/Center for Documents and Documentation in Amman, and the Institute for Palestine Studies in Washington and Beirut.

Fischbach, in other words, has done his homework. And fortunately, he writes in a cool, scholarly, impartial style – free of polemics and rhetoric.

As early as December 1947, literally within days of the UN's decision to partition Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state, Palestinians began leaving their homes in Haifa, Jaffa and Jerusalem. Many were well-to-do merchants and professionals confident they would come back. Rural dwellers whose villages were levelled were the next to leave, voluntarily or otherwise. Both sides agree that several hundred Palestinian villages – from 360 to 429 – disappeared during Israel's War of Independence.

Documents Fischbach examined at Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs suggest that 3.6 million dunams of land (one dunam is equal to about 900 square metres) were abandoned by, or seized from, the Palestinians. Using data amassed by scholar Yusif Sayigh, Fischbach concludes that Palestinian refugees lost 173,000 buildings. Prior to 1948, Jews owned 6.59 per cent of the surface area of Palestine.

Israel, though not the Zionist Revisionists, accepted the principle of partition. But when the War of Independence broke out, some Israeli political figures, including the foreign minister, Moshe Shertok (Sharett), revised their views.

When it became clear to him and others that 45 per cent of the population of the nascent Jewish state would be Palestinian, Shertok observed that the flight of the refugees would present Israel with opportunities for "a lasting and radical solution" to its looming demographic dilemma.

Even as battles raged, Jews began moving into abandoned Palestinian homes. My wife's parents, Bulgarian immigrants who arrived in Israel in 1951, lived in such a dwelling in Jaffa for a few years.

Fischbach claims that Holocaust survivors broke into abandoned Palestinian homes in Haifa's Wadi Nisnas neighbourhood. They did so because barracks that they were assigned on kibbutzim reminded them of their quarters in Nazi concentration camps.

By the autumn of 1948, he adds, the Jewish Agency formally began allowing Jews to take up residence in abandoned refugee homes in Jaffa, Lydda (Lod) and Ramla. One-third of all new immigrants resided in such buildings by the early 1950s.

In June 1948, the Israeli cabinet passed the first of a series of laws and regulations that laid the legal basis for the expropriation of refugee land and its eventual disposal. Fischbach explains that the purpose of these edicts was to stop the spontaneous seizures of Palestinian land. The Jewish National Fund utilized these lands for settlement, agricultural, commercial and industrial purposes.

A Palestinian refugee

David Ben-Gurion – Israel's first prime minister – agreed in principle to compensation. But he soon clarified his position, restricting the land for which he was willing to pay compensation.

Israel subsequently declared that the Arab economic boycott, as well as Egypt's closure of the Suez Canal to Israeli shipping, had hurt its economy and thus its ability to compensate the refugees.

This was an issue that came up in secret talks between Israel and Jordan in the aftermath of the War of Independence. But as Fischbach points out, the assassination of Jordan's King Abdullah in 1951 quashed all prospects for Israeli compensation to refugees living in Jordan.

Nevertheless, Arab states continuously raised the issue and urged Israel to halt seizures of Palestinian property. According to the Arabs, the value of the refugees' property ranged from $3 billion to $5 billion in U.S. dollars.

Israel, rightly, claimed that the Arabs were cynically using the refugees to perpetuate the Arab-Israeli dispute. There was an attempt, at the 1949 Lausanne conference in Switzerland, to come to grips with the problem, but fundamental procedural issues blocked progress. Israel wanted to discuss compensation arrangements only within the context of peace talks, but the Arabs balked. Furthermore, they categorically refused to consider the resettlement of the refugees in the Arab world as an alternative to repatriation.

The United States exerted pressure on Israel to make a gesture to the refugees. In response, Abba Eban, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, announced Israel's readiness to funnel 11 million British pounds into a special compensation fund.

In general, Israel was prepared to pay compensation only for cultivated land, provided it was released from the obligation of making further payments and compensation was part of an overall peace accord with the Arabs.

Israel raised counter-claims. As a result of the 1948 war, Jews lost 16,684 dunams in the West Bank – particularly around Jerusalem, Hebron, Nablus, Jenin and Tulkarm – and bits of land in the Gaza Strip, Lebanon, Jordan and Syria. Fischbach zeroes in on these long-forgotten places.

In addition, Israel brought up the still burning issue of Jewish property losses in Arab countries such as Iraq and Egypt. But as he observes, some Jews from Arab lands were less than pleased that their expropriated properties were being used as a bargaining chip with the Arabs. What they wanted was hard, cold cash, not protracted negotiations.

In terms of its importance to other issues, the refugee problem took a back seat after the 1956 Suez war. But in 1957, Israel informed the United States that it would pay compensation to refugees in Jordan on the condition that they would be resettled in Iraq. Nothing came of that overture.

During the early 1960s, U.S. envoy Eric Johnson grappled with the issue. But in the end, after a ferocious Israeli diplomatic campaign against Johnson, the Kennedy administration let his mission lapse.

The refugee issue sank into further obscurity in the 1970s and 1980s, a UN General Assembly resolution notwithstanding, and would not be revived until the Oslo peace process. But at the 2000 Camp David summit and the Taba talks that followed, it proved to be a deal breaker.

One day, Israel and the Palestinians may devise a formula that will satisfy both sides. But for now, as Fischbach amply illustrates, the incendiary refugee issue poisons their relations.

Torontonian volunteers for the Jews of Poland

University graduate joins Joint Distribution Committee project that helps Jews world wide

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Not many university students choose to spend their summer holidays volunteering their time in Ghana and Ukraine, for Torontonian Jennifer Cole, it was something that just made sense. It was only fitting, then, that after graduating from University of Western Ontario in London, she accepted the challenge of working on behalf of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) - an overseas partner agency of UJA Federation - as a community developer in Poland.

As part of the JDC's Jewish Service Corps, seven North American volunteers have taken up posts around the world, and out of over 50 people who applied, Cole was the only Canadian chosen.

"I was really lucky; this is an amazing opportunity," Cole said when reached by phone in the southern mountain range of Poland last week. "I knew I wanted to do a year abroad after university, and I wanted to work with the Jewish community. My time in Ukraine when I was volunteering with the International Jewish College Corps, during summer holidays motivated me. This project was the right fit."

Cole has been living in Poland, with Warsaw as her base, for the last six weeks, traveling around the country, meeting with Jewish community members who are in need of advice and developing strategies for them which over the last few years has become increasingly directed toward celebrating Jewish heritage.

"Basically, I am here to work with the Polish Union of Jewish Students, helping them with their organization," she explained. "I am here to empower them, give them the tools so that when I leave they will have the resources to run Jewish programming activities without me."

In her short time in Poland, Cole has already made some interesting discoveries which have dispelled many of her preconceived notions.

"Poland is not any more antisemitic than any other country I have visited," she said. "And that's not what I expected. I've also learned to question my perceptions of who is a Jew. Every day you meet people who are only now discovering they have Jewish roots. People here choose to be Jewish; they haven't been brought up with it, which is very different from my own life experience. It is very inspiring to see."

JIAS and Beth Tzedec team up to help new immigrants

The stereotype of the wandering Jew was born from the tragic history of the Jewish people. Yet, in the 21st century, Jewish immigration still continues with Toronto considered a prime destination.

Over the last four years, increasing numbers of Argentinean Jews have been immigrating to Toronto and with the help of JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto, Beth Tzedec Congregation, and Toronto philanthropist Harold Wolfe, this new community is receiving a wonderful welcome.

Moved by the plight of Argentinean Jewry he witnessed on a recent trip to Buenos Aires, Wolfe looked for a way to help make their transition to life in Toronto as easy as possible.

"I realized there was much I could do," said Wolfe. "The primary problem recent immigrants face is establishing social contacts with local Jews. While these contacts may or may not lead to long- lasting friendships, they, at least, help newcomers find out ordinary things and become self sufficient."

In order to link Argentinean Jews with others in the community, Wolfe worked with JIAS – a partner agency of UJA Federation - on a special Shabbat service and lunch at Beth Tzedec. The event would act as a catalyst for the Argentineans to meet community members and create a new network so desperately missing in their lives.

"What Harold and Carole Wolfe are doing gets to the heart of what is needed for new immigrants," said JIAS executive director Janis Roth. "New immigrants want to become self sufficient. They want to work and contribute to the society that granted them a safe place to live. These kinds of initiatives, and others from the Toronto Jewish community, which offer a newcomer an opportunity to network, really tip the balance in the right direction and can make all the difference."

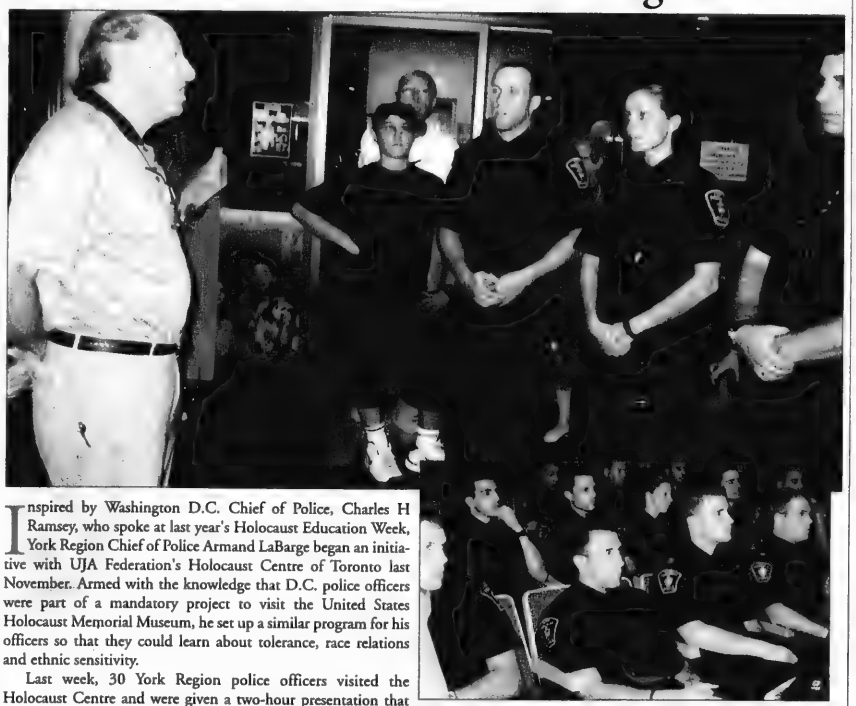
Police armed with knowledge



Inspired by Washington D.C. Chief of Police, Charles H Ramsey, who spoke at last year's Holocaust Education Week, York Region Chief of Police Armand LaBarge began an initiative with UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto last November. Armed with the knowledge that D.C. police officers were part of a mandatory project to visit the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, he set up a similar program for his officers so that they could learn about tolerance, race relations and ethnic sensitivity.

Last week, 30 York Region police officers visited the Holocaust Centre and were given a two-hour presentation that included a tour of the museum and a discussion with Holocaust survivor Nate Leipciger (pictured in forefront above). Born in Poland, Leipciger survived five different concentration camps including Auschwitz and Dachau. This was the second group of officers who have visited the centre this year. Several more are being planned.

Israeli superstar David Broza set to rock campaign launch

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

It's not every day that a campaign launch presents a top-tier musician and recording artist. But come September 1, David Broza will be entertaining participants at the launch of UJA Federation Campaign 2006 at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

With a career that spans over 30 years and 23 albums, Broza has become synonymous with the best in Israeli music.

Broza is a complex musician, part poet, part troubadour, part rock and roller all rapped into one individual with a social conscience, known for playing for Israeli soldiers in bunkers on the front lines, the wounded in hospitals, and those suffering from shock and pain.

David Broza

"Music brings excitement when someone is in shock. Music is a healing factor," Broza said in a recent telephone interview from Israel. "Music energizes through emotion. It takes away the misery and can inspire."

If the daily grind of the entertainment business has worn him down over the years, it does not show. Although incredibly busy recording, performing, writing and creating, Broza is still compelled to help those who may be lost or in need.

"I am lucky as an artist that my one simple act of playing music for someone who is suffering can become so meaningful," he said. "Ten or 15 minutes can change someone's life and give hope. I have to do it; there is no choice."

With his musical influences ranging from Jimmy Hendrix to Bob Dylan and fellow Israeli artist, Shalom Chanoch, Broza has been performing in Canada for years and is quick to note his appreciation for his Toronto fans.

"I really enjoy coming to Canada, to have the interaction with the audiences there," he said. "I always get a great reaction from Toronto. I like that contact with them."

The Campaign Launch will also feature Josh Malina, a star of television's weekly drama, The West Wing.

New community security director a former member of IDF

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation has implemented a prime recommendation of its task force on community security.

Enter Doron Kay, the new community security director.

The Canadian born Kay, 40, was raised in Jerusalem, joined UJA Federation earlier this month following stints in New York, Miami, Europe and Israel, where he was also involved with community security. In addition, Kay started his own business, Global Impact, which specializes in crisis and emergency management and terrorism consulting.

Doron Kay

In his new role, Kay will be responsible for establishing and implementing new security standards, procedures and policies, as well as monitoring and assessing any potential threats to the Jewish community. He will also be in regular contact with federal and local law enforcement officials when needed.

"The worldwide Jewish community - including Toronto - has always been under threat," says Kay who has been a security specialist for the last 20 years and served in the Israeli Defence Forces where he was a decorated soldier. "One of the most important aspects of security is to counter chaos with reason and order. We need to be vigilant and always maintain a security presence which must be a collective effort by the community which is an act of will. Then, in times of any real threats, we will have the necessary tools in place."

Chaired by Warren Kimel, the UJA Federation Task Force on Community Security - formed in the fall of 2004 - commissioned a thorough study of existing security measures at Toronto's Jewish schools. A series of meetings with school officials has been set up to review the findings.

The Task Force's next step will be to study security at agencies, synagogues and other facilities throughout Toronto's Jewish community.

"In today's environment and the global war on terrorism, unfortunately security plays an integral role in protecting the quality of life that we have worked so hard to achieve and which we must continue to protect," says Kay.

Jewish teachers graduate from special course

According to many Jewish educators, the experience of teaching children with special needs at a day or supplementary school is distinct and accompanied by its own set of unique challenges. With this in mind, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education's Tikun Chaim initiative joined forces with York University to create a certificate in Special Education designed for teachers in the Jewish school system. The program is the only Ontario Ministry of Education accredited course that is offered to all Jewish day and supplementary school teachers.

Certificate program participants may expand their own teaching skills in order to address the needs of exceptional students within the classroom. Teachers learn new strategies to adapt and tailor general, Hebrew, and Judaic studies curricula to the diverse needs of their students.

"No child should have to leave the Jewish day or supplementary school system because of his or her special needs," explained Dafna Ross, special education consultant and certificate program director. "The system should meet the needs of every child so that all children can benefit from a Jewish education."

An added advantage of this course was the creation of a network of supportive colleagues. Carol Green, senior kindergarten and grade one teacher at Netivot HaTorah Day School was very motivated by what she learned.

"This certificate course was incredibly helpful because I was able to meet many other resourceful people who will enable me to better problem solve issues as they arise," she explained. "I also learned the tools needed to advocate for students with special needs, to set down objective insights so that I can present their case, and create an effective plan to ensure their educational success."

The twenty-three teachers who will be graduating from the course on August 28th, will take these new tools with them into the classroom.

"We are all different, with different talents," Ross said. "This certificate program offers every teacher in the day and supplementary school systems the same opportunity of understanding this concept and celebrating it in the classroom. It is in this way that we are enriching our students and that certainly is a good thing."

Twenty-three teachers will graduate from the BJE's Tikun Chaim certificate program in special education in a joint venture with York University. (photo by Debbie Gladstone)

Jerusalem Foundation revives Canadian branch

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

The Canadian branch of the Jerusalem Foundation is being revived.

With a new Canada desk in Israel, under Steve Solomon and two new executive directors, Mindy Avrich-Skapinker in Toronto, and Monica Berger in Montreal, the organization has some exciting projects on the horizon.

But the question many would ask is, when there are a myriad of other Jewish organizations and projects needing support, why revive the foundation now?

Statistics indicate an ongoing trend of Jewish migration from Jerusalem – 18,500 left in 2004, an increase of 13,300 from 2003. People are leaving because there are better job opportunities and more affordable housing available outside the city.

At the same time, the number of Palestinians in the city continues to rise. Thirty-four per cent of the city's 700,000 residents are Palestinian and 66 per cent, Jewish.

Over and above that, there are many myths propagating Jewish rights to Jerusalem and the "Islamatization" of Jerusalem is becoming a real problem, says Avrich-Skapinker.

"Jerusalem is becoming more and more inaccessible to non-Palestinians."

She stressed that Jerusalem needs to be built up with a strong Jewish presence to ensure it remains the Jewish capital.

After years of promises, in June of this year, the Israeli government approved a series of economic benefits aimed at spurring development in Jerusalem.

The 280-million-shekel package (approximately $62 million US) includes incentives for young couples buying apartments, as well as perks for companies relocating to Jerusalem.

Avrich-Skapinker, who has her PhD in eastern European Jewish history from the University of Toronto, was a member of the Canadian government's immigration and refugee board for 10 years.

Berger is the wife of former Canadian ambassador to Israel, David Berger, and is what Avrich-Skapinker describes as a "high energy French Canadian, well-networked in Montreal and Ottawa." Berger helped to run the Canadian embassy in Israel for 4½ years, while her husband was the ambassador.

The Jerusalem Foundation is an independent, non-partisan, community organization that was started in Israel in 1966 by the first mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kollek, together with a group of his friends from around the world.

He had a dream of building a pluralistic city where all of its citizens could live together equally – the religious and the secular, native Israelis and new immigrants, the rich and poor, and Arabs, Christians and Jews.

He wanted to improve educational opportunities, close the gaps between the city's different sectors and create a city that would serve all its citizens in the best way possible.

Almost 40 years after its founding, the Jerusalem Foundation is run by international chair Dan Meridor and president Ruth Cheshin, who has held the position since the organization's inception.

It supports projects in the areas of social services, youth and education, diversity and tolerance, arts and culture, parks and recreation, and history and heritage.

Since its establishment, the foundation has contributed to 2,000 projects – from small neighbourhood parks to world-renowned landmarks.

They include the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra, the Jerusalem Music Center, Tisch Family Zoological Gardens, the Tower of David Museum for the History of Jerusalem, the University Botanical Gardens Jerusalem, the Via Dolorosa – renovations and the YMCA Peace Kindergarten for Jewish and Arab children.

At the time of the foundation's inception, Kollek said, "We created an opportunity for Jews and non-Jews from around the world to play a significant role in shaping Jerusalem's future – we established the Jerusalem Foundation."

Canada has a strong link with the foundation as Kollek's brother was Canadian and Kollek spent a fair amount of time visiting and establishing networks here.

But over the years, the foundation stopped operating in Canada, with the last foundation project completed 10 years ago.

Mannie Batshaw, 90, volunteer president of the Canadian Jerusalem Foundation said, "Jerusalem has nourished the Jewish people for 2,000 years and now it's our turn to nourish Jerusalem."

In June, Berger and Avrich-Skapinker, on a mission to Israel, saw what the foundation had done there. On their return, they began to establish a new national board for the Canadian Jerusalem Foundation.

"We are trying to achieve a balance of people on this board – some people with a high profile and influence in the community, some with academic and ideological interest in the issues concerning Israel, and then, also some younger people who are committed to the city of Jerusalem and Israel as a whole," said Avrich-Skapinker.

Berger and Avrich-Skapinker also invite people in the community to join the advisory committee and to help to organize fundraising events.

The first event takes place on Sept. 20 at the Bluma Appel Theatre, where Nalaga'at, a deaf and blind theatre group from Israel will be performing a school matinee and an evening show.

"The foundation is looking for volunteers and now, more than ever, needs to set its sights on building and improving the city of Jerusalem to make it a strong Jewish capital," Avrich-Skapinker says.

Jewish Life

A reJewvenating retreat

By MIRIAM STUCKY
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

I've been seeking a spiritual home – a place of kindred spirits, shared meals, shared spiritual observance, and conscious commitment to respecting people and the earth. Recently, this search lead me to Elat Chayyim, a Jewish Renewal retreat centre in the Catskills of New York State.

For years, friends have participated in retreats at the centre and described it as a place to renew their relationship to Judaism, community and the earth in a safe and supportive environment. The beginning of a new "eco-apprentice" program and the second year of a residential community (something the centre's director Bennett Neiman referred to lightly as a "Jewish ashram") at the centre were enough to have me New York bound.

The morning after I arrived, I took part in davening like none other – full-throated, full-hearted group prayer led by rabbi-in-residence David Ingber. At times, I found myself able to pour myself into the experience, to contribute my own whole heart, through my voice, into this new, joyful experience. Participants included about 30 people from the residential community, as well as summer interns and students in two week-long training programs (including one group learning to be community chant leaders).

Members of the residential community labour alongside paid staff in the day-to-day work of the centre, but I did manage to sneak in a woodland walk with Simon Abramson, a resident and one of the organizers of the eco-apprentice program. He's one of those rare people gifted with being both laid back and focused. He came to Elat Chayyim last fall through a confluence of personal clarity, timing and mazel. In its search for organizational renewal, Elat Chayyim is granting real responsibility and opportunity to several people in their early 20s to develop new programs. Along with an occasional lack of organization and a narrow focus (at present the residential community is only for people in their 20s and 30s), the young leadership gives a lovely, creative energy to the centre's undertakings.

Friday afternoon brought preparations for the mikvah. The learned woman leading the ritual explained the process for the experienced and uninitiated alike. She welcomed women of all ages and shapes to be comfortable, present and free.

But as the time to enter the pool drew nearer, my eyes darted again and again toward the gate to the pool – where were my people? Where were the beautiful, capable young women I'd been getting to know through the week? Had they gathered elsewhere? Were they somehow disassociating themselves from this gathering? Though long surrounded by, and exceedingly comfortable with, women 10, 20 and 30 years my senior, I craved the company and nearness of women my age, of like minds and hearts. Though dozens of women were present, the ritual felt incomplete without the young women who were coming to matter to me. I felt incomplete entering the mikvah without them. And as they began to appear (late – who knew how like me they were), I smiled at the inner learning that was taking place within me, of the realization of what constitutes "community" for me.

Shabbat was not my usual Ontario Saturday, trying to observe most of the day's prohibitions and feeling restless, dissatisfied and alone. Instead, it was a taste of what (my) Olam Haba would offer: a sumptuous lunch buffet, including dessert, as well as frisbee in the warm rain and being lifted in the air in an impromptu dance jam. Heaven on earth.

Did I find my spiritual home? Will I move to Elat Chayyim in the fall? No. My spiritual practice isn't as devoted to daily prayer and study as that of this community. My need for intergenerational community, for existing friends and family, is strong. I will, however, be more active in my growing local Jewish community. I will make an effort to gather with others and study issues of social justice and spiritual practice. I will certainly seek out lunch buffets with dessert, frisbee and improvisational dance, and will keep up on developments in the Neshamah Fellowship in Jewish Spiritual Community and upcoming programs, including a conference on Judaism and activism.

Modern-day idol worship

By RABBI DAVID BAUMAN

Rabbinic Reflections

In his Mishneh Torah, Maimonides describes a phenomenon that was true in the days leading up to the life of Abraham and is still true today. "In the days of Enosh, the people fell into gross error, and the counsel of the wise men of the generation became foolish… Their error was as follows: 'Since, God,' they said, 'created these stars and spheres to guide the world, set them on high and allotted to them honour, and since they are ministers who minister before Him, they deserve to be praised and glorified, and honour should be rendered them; and it is the will of God, blessed be He… When this idea arose in their minds, they began to erect temples to the stars, offered up sacrifices to them, praised and glorified them in speech, and prostrated themselves before them… In course of time, there arose among men false prophets who asserted that God had commanded and expressly told them, 'Worship that particular star.'"

Similarly, in our age, many people have shifted their attention from God to modern-day idolatry. I realized this when my electronic organizer crashed recently and I lost much of my stored information. How many of us record our every move in such a device? Whether we use a Palm or Blackberry, or whether we still use paper, essentially, we worship and are enslaved to technology. Yet I wonder whether the information we spend time detailing is ultimately very important.

Parshat Ekev teaches us a transcendent lesson about Jewish living. Long before day-planners, the rabbinic interpretation of the Torah enabled Jews to schedule their lives in an orderly fashion and remind them of what is truly important in their lives. The Torah in Deuteronomy commands that after marking a period of the day by eating, Jews must give thanks to God "for the good land which He has given you."

This verse is the basis for Birkat Hamazon, the grace after meals, which enables us to reflect daily on four transcendent Judaic themes that are communicated through the four core blessings of the liturgy. The first reminds us that God is ultimately responsible for our nourishment. The second draws our attention to the Land of Israel and the uniqueness of its produce. The third reminds us of our yearnings for a religious centre for the Jewish People, recalling the kingship of David and the Holy Temple. The fourth completes the message by reinforcing that God is good and spreads his goodness.

Sefer Abudraham discusses a custom that reinforces the essence of the four themes. "There is a common practice when we recite the Birkat Hamazon that we remove the knives from the table." Quoting the Talmud, it explains the reasoning thus: "At the time that the Holy Jerusalem Temple stood, the altar atoned for our sins. Now that the Temple is no longer in existence our table [the one that we eat at] atones for us… All who lengthen our table lengthen his days and years because when we lengthen our table, the poor will come and will benefit from the same table. There is no justice greater than this, as Proverbs teaches justice will save [us] from death."

Today, advances in technology can help us improve God's world and not continue its destruction. But as in the days before Abraham, humanity has been sidetracked, albeit this time by gadgets. The Jewish People must be a light unto the nations. We can do this by focusing on Judaism's core values: God, Israel, and the belief in a messianic time and the goodness of God's world. Removing knives from our tables before Birkat Hamazon reminds us that violence will not help usher in the messianic period. As the Aleinu prayer says, may we merit to see "the day when the Lord is acknowledged as King of all the earth. On that day, the Lord will be One and His name One."

Elul and the journey of return

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Soon we will enter the month of Elul and our preparations for Rosh Hashanah and all the High Holy Days will begin. During Elul, each person can begin the process of reviewing their year. We search inwardly, as difficult questions are raised about how we made our choices this year and whether or not we have advanced or retreated in our development. With honest assessments, Judaism considers that we have laid the foundation for the repentance that is to follow.

Interestingly, the word in Hebrew for repentance is "tshuvah," which comes from the root word that means "to return." In English, the word repentance means to feel remorse for a past act. It is most commonly connected with a Latin root that means "to creep along the ground." The implication is that a person is ashamed of his or her past action and is prostrating themselves on the ground in remorse. It has a sense of the past catching up to the person and the emotional focus becomes the present moment. The person is now regretful.

Yet in Hebrew, the process is somewhat different. Tshuvah implies that a person is to first return, meaning stepping backward. There is not yet a sense of remorse or regret, but a first step of investigation. It is only once we begin this return that we might be led toward an understanding of our choices. We are not yet regretful, since we have only begun our exploration.

But to what is the person returning?

On the one hand, there is the concept of returning to God. Many Jewish philosophers have written about how the bad choices we make can distance us from God. In that sense, tshuvah would refer to the process by which we are to return our hearts toward God, making it easier to make better choices in the future. The road of return is a journey back to the Source.

But there is another aspect to the return that is expressed in the Talmud. According to our sages, as we are carried in the womb, each of us has an angel that teaches us the entire Torah. As our bodies are developing and we gain our physical characteristics, at the same time our souls are developing and the teachings of Torah are being incorporated into our essence. The sages continue that while we are being born, our angel taps us on the mouth, leaving an indentation on our upper lip. This causes us to forget everything we have been taught at the instant we take our first breath.

In other words, once Torah is coded into our very beings, it sits at our core throughout our lifetime. When we are born, it is the journey that becomes important and, therefore, we forget the conclusions. However, every correction we make within ourselves throughout our lives is in reality a return to a "womb wisdom" that we have always possessed.

At times we feel that something is wrong. Unable to put words to the feeling or to explain why it would be wrong, there is nevertheless something inside that does not sit right. According to the Talmud, every person is equipped with all the information they need to make moral choices throughout their lives. The question is whether or not we connect with these truths – whether or not we return.

The month of Elul ushers us into a process of discovery and of re-discovery. Before we begin the New Year and our thoughts turn toward the future, we have a month to start the process of tshuvah, the journey backward to connect with both God and the essence of ourselves.

Back-to-school sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week I introduced you to sites for Jewish families who are interested in homeschooling their children. Even if this kind of education isn't for you, you can benefit from some of the great educational sites that homeschoolers find themselves coming back to. As everyone gets ready for another school year, here are some recommended back-to-school sites, most geared to kids, some to parents and teachers.

Jewish Funland is a place to play a game, listen to some music, have a laugh – and learn at the same time. Do you know the difference between a "para" and "parpar"? The Animal World Match game will help teach you the Hebrew words for cow, butterfly and dozens of other animals. There are online crossword puzzles and an Israel Prime Minister Word Search Game. [http://tinyurl.com/ahcet]

Akhlah: The Jewish Children's Learning Network is a huge site with activities about the Jewish calendar, Israeli geography and Jewish heroes. Its Aleph-Bet section has colouring pages for every letter in the Hebrew alphabet, as well as printable flash cards, practice pages and a button to hear how the letter pronounced. [www.akhlah.com/]

Torahtots is full of stories, games and colouring pages. One of the central points of the site is an explanation of the current week's Torah reading in Parsha On Parade. The songs are lively and have names like Totsland, Skibble Dibble and Hodu HaShem (Praise God): "Every soda pop, every clip that clops, every two fives for a 10, every ring around the collar, and the medicine you swallow, proclaims, Hodu L'HaShem."

I must admit that I do find the audio welcome at the Torah Tots home page a bit overwhelming. You can bypass it by going straight to the site-map page. [www.torahtots.com/sitemap.htm]

Zigzagworld has put together a wonderful collection of online games such as Dress The Torah, Why Don't Zebras Play Chess? and the frustrating AlefBetGo! Their Hebrew For Me section includes their own games, which teach vocabulary for breakfast, at a picnic and in a sukkah. And for more advanced students who want to learn how to type in Hebrew the proper way, there's the Hebrew Keyboard Tutor. You'll see a miniature Hebrew keyboard on your screen, and when you type A, S, D, F, you'll see shin, dalet, gimel, kaf. As the zebra hangs Hebrew letters on a clothesline, you are prompted to tap the corresponding key. Congratulations to anyone who makes it to level five. [www.zigzagworld.com/]

For parents and teachers, the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE) site provides suggestions, articles and links about a wide variety of topics. They range from the traditional (experiential curriculum for the Tishrei holidays and essays on Jewish early childhood education) to the contemporary (Jewish response to the tsunami and Jewish views on end-of-life questions and euthanasia). To help foster dialogue about youth violence, CAJE created a 16-page document called Do Not Separate Yourself From The Community. [www.caje.org/learn/fs_curricular.html]

And finally my favourite site, J – Jewish Education and Entertainment. Jacob Richman is one creative guy. Richman has created several wonderful games that will keep kids (and their parents) busy for hours. You can try some challenging Jewish trivia quizzes (Jewish holidays, Israeli geography, entertainers, and more.) He provides Hebrew song lyrics as well as a Jewish Clipart Database with more than 150 lovely pictures that children can copy and use in school assignments. And he has designed a lovely little program that allows site visitors to type and print signs in Hebrew, even without Hebrew fonts installed on their computers. [www.j.co.il/]

And as hockey fans are gearing up for a long-awaited NHL season, here's a question from one of Jacob Richman's quizzes.

Who is the all-time leading Jewish scorer in NHL history?

a) Steve Dubinsky
b) Mathieu Schneider
c) David Nemirovsky
d) Ronnie Stern

Pullout coverage surprisingly good – but not perfect

"When the withdrawal is complete, Israel will be the darling of the world." (Yoel Marcus, Ha'aretz, Aug. 12)

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The amount of media attention given to Israel's disengagement from Gaza and the northern West Bank has been staggering. It reflects the intense concentration of approximately 2,500 members of the media who have flooded into Israel, in addition to those already based there, to witness a momentous event in Israel's history and one of the most significant developments in recent Mideast politics.

In the week leading up to the Aug. 17 deadline for settlers to voluntarily vacate their homes, much of the media provided detailed portraits – many of them surprisingly sympathetic – of Jews being forced to give up property they've owned, in many cases, for decades.

As the evictions began, cameras captured the agony when the men, women and children who had not already left voluntarily were physically removed. Crying, screaming, and pleading, the settlers were often moved out by soldiers and police who were equally distraught by the nature of their task.

Yet the predicted wide-scale violence did not occur; nor did the greatly exaggerated predictions of "civil war" come to pass. Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres said that while Israel may be divided politically, it is united democratically (BBC, Aug. 16). The general orderliness amid the non-violent resistance confirmed his statement.

The settlers, who had been so frequently demonized by the media as a monolithic, rapacious lot, were now seen in human terms as victims of forced evacuation – this time at the hands of other Jews. Still, a few negative trends started to emerge in some major media reports. On BBC World, which the CBC had been airing after locking out its unionized workers, Orla Guerin said night after night that the settlers thought they would stay forever on "occupied Palestinian land" and that "the international community thought they should never have been here in the first place."

Gaza settlers were convinced that they had a right to the land, some of which had been purchased before 1948 when they fled before the invading Egyptian army. Terence Smith of PBS' Newshour got it right when he said "The densely settled 139 square mile stretch of land at the edge of the Mediterranean Sea has been disputed for decades (Aug. 15)." The fact is, the precise status of the territories remains to be determined through negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's motives have also come under intense media scrutiny. Many critics feel Sharon is giving up Gaza in order to secure Israel's grip on the West Bank.

But Tom Clark, host of CTV's National, cast no doubt on Sharon's motives when he introduced Janis Mackey Frayer's Aug. 15 disengagement story: "From the Middle East tonight, a historic withdrawal meant to advance peace." Frayer herself said: "It's at least hoped the pullout could provide peace talks here, so Ariel Sharon says it's now up to the Palestinians that if they choose to extend an olive branch, Israel would do the same."

On the question of Sharon's motives, former U.S. chief Mideast peace negotiator Dennis Ross had the best reply (BBC World, Aug. 15):

"Here, after all, is the father of the settlement movement – and he's facing such opposition from his own base precisely because he's withdrawing from settlements that he encouraged to be there. I think one has to be a little bit cautious about being so certain that they know what Sharon's next move will be.

"If the Palestinians make Gaza into a model of what they in fact are prepared to do in terms of good governance and security, and fulfillment of responsibilities, then it seems to me that it creates its own dynamic, its own set of pressures to do something on the West Bank as well, even from Sharon's standpoint. And if they don't, it takes all the pressure off Sharon and anybody else in Israel to do more in the West Bank."

Now, as to Yoel Marcus's prediction which prefaces this piece, let's simply say "Not so fast."

Jewish special education teachers tour Israel

By SUZANNE WINTROB
JTA

With a dozen years of teaching behind her, Sheri Kravetsky knows that each child relates to learning differently.

That's why she's constantly on the lookout for the latest special-education techniques to help her preschoolers thrive.

"Each child approaches their classroom expectations in a different way," says Kravetsky, who has spent the past nine years as a preschool teacher at Eitz Chaim Day Schools. "They may be auditory learners, tactile learners or visual learners, yet it's up to the teacher to be able to adapt to each in a multisensory fashion so as to maximize the child's potential."

On Aug. 28, Kravetsky and 22 other Jewish day-school and supplementary-school teachers will receive a certificate in special education from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education and York University.

The year-long Tikun Chaim program, which the board says is the first of its kind in North America, covers all aspects of special education.

For a final assignment, students prepared a research and practicum project. Many based their projects on their classroom experiences, producing reading programs and insightful theories on education for gifted children.

The course culminated in the Jewish Agency for Israel's first trip for special-education teachers to Israel, which Tikun Chaim director Debbie Gladstone said reinforced what had been learned in the classroom.

The trip was co-sponsored by the Jewish National Fund and the federation's Partnership 2000 program.

About half of the matriculating students, including Kravetsky, toured Israel to hear from academics and observe innovative special-education programs in action.

Tikum Chaim program first of its kind in North America

Kravetsky says she initially signed up for the course to find strategies to help her preschoolers succeed in the classroom. But the Tikun Chaim program also taught her how to identify behavioural disorders, recognize special-education candidates, conduct assessments, advocate for students and handle administration and parents.

She also learned about the government's role in special education and about services available in her area.

"I came back from every class exhilarated," says Kravetsky, 43, a mother of five. "I brought it back to my classroom right away – whether in how I organized my day, how I related to the students, or even how I interacted with my co-workers and the school administration."

But it was the Israel experience that brought it all together, she says. In Eilat, Toronto's sister city, the group visited a therapeutic horse ranch and discovered that children who don't like to talk can climb on a horse and feel comfortable being vocal. They also observed children with physical disabilities, aided by a therapist, swimming with dolphins.

The group also visited Kishurit, a community in the Galilee for special-needs adults, and went to Beit Issie Shapiro in Ra'anana, which each year serves nearly 7,750 children and adults with developmental disabilities. At Beit Issie Shapiro, they toured a sensory-treatment room for introverted children and saw how flashing lights and soft music can stimulate a child's senses.

At Havat Hashomer, an army training base in the Golan Heights, the Tikun Chaim group learned about disadvantaged youth who get extra training, remedial education and ongoing assistance to help them succeed in the army and enhance their future prospects. They also went to Etgarim, an outdoor sports and recreation centre in Tel Aviv, where they learned about wheelchair-bound people who are able to rappel down a wall.

The Tikun Chaim students were particularly intrigued by the teacher-parent interactions they witnessed. Many Israeli teachers they spoke with visit their students' homes to get a complete picture of the child, something Canadian teachers rarely do.

"It showed such dedication, that they're always willing to make connections with the child whatever way possible, so they can promote the child's success," Kravetsky says.

"The entire experience has made me think in a much more creative and industrious way when it comes to practising in the classroom," she said. "It's not about the teacher standing up there being the authoritative figure. It's about the child participating in the learning process as well."

A second group of 26 teachers, representing Jewish preschools, elementary, middle and high schools, began their Tikun Chaim studies this month.

Gladstone hopes the course will run for a third time next year.

"They came out feeling really great," she says of the program's first graduating class. "They learned a tremendous amount and they have made huge changes" in terms of "how they view kids and how they view themselves working in the classroom. One of the teachers said the word 'lazy' has come out of her vocabulary. It's quite spectacular."

Group launches matching grants initiative for Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A U.S.-based organization with members in Canada has launched a new program to support non-profit projects in Israel.

The Jewish Funders Network, with headquarters in New York City, has started what is describes as a matching grants initiative.

"We've been active in Israel for many years, but this is the first time we have taken such an active role in trying to stimulate philanthropy there," the group's Canadian-born president, Mark Charendoff, said in an interview last week.

Mark Charendoff

"Part of our motivation is the success we have had in our first matching grants program, which was focused on Jewish education," he added.

"Part of it, though, was prompted by recent studies that showed that young American Jews are losing interest in Israel as a place to focus their philanthropy."

The Jewish Funders Network has set aside $2 million (US) in capital in the form of matching funds for first-time grants of $25,000 to $50,000.

It is doing so in partnership with the Sacta-Rashi Foundation, one of the leading private family funds in Israel dedicated to helping the underprivileged.

Charendoff, a former Torontonian, said that grants will support non-profit projects in four areas: bridging social and economic gaps, health care, education about the environment and education to further coexistence.

Proposals will be considered through Oct. 31, 2005.

The need to bridge social and economic gaps in Israel is urgent, the group says.

It notes that thirty per cent of Israeli children live at or below the poverty line, and almost half of Israeli Arabs and more than seven out of 10 Ethiopian Jewish families are impoverished. As a result, the poor have gone without care due to the cost of medical services.

Meanwhile, Israelis requiring special care, such as people with physical and mental disabilities, often cannot meet their medical needs.

Water pollution and water scarcity threaten Israel's ecological well-being. Today, Israel ranks 88th out of 122 countries in terms of water quality, lower than Egypt and Bangladesh. Israeli environmentalists are attempting to reverse current trends, but they may be fighting a losing battle unless they have access to more funds.

Twenty per cent of all Israelis are Arabs, and one out of three citizens is a new immigrant. With this in mind, the Jewish Funders Network wants to promote tolerance, equality and trust among Israel's citizens so as to enhance its social fabric.

Founded 15 years ago, with about 850 members around the world, it consists of family foundations, public philanthropies and individual funders dedicated to advancing the quality and growth of philanthropy rooted in Jewish values.

Charendoff, a graduate of the Associated Hebrew Schools, said his organization works closely with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Canadian Jews enjoy a far closer relationship with Israel than do their cousins south of the border," he said. "We are really looking to the Canadian Jewish community to continue their leadership in this respect.

"Our hope is that they will inspire some of the young Jews of wealth in the United States by their example and help us foster the next generation of Jewish philanthropists who will be dedicated to making a difference in Israel and in the lives of Israelis."

Na'amat's Club Masada celebrates 60 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 60 years, members of Na'amat Toronto's Club Masada are not resting on their laurels.

In the past year, the group of mostly octogenarians raised about $76,000 for the organization, whose mission is to enhance the status of women, children and families in Israel and Canada.

Over the years, "guesstimates" Pearl Mekler, a founding member, they have raised at least $2 million. "In 1945, we raised $305, and in the '90s we peaked at $100,000."

They're also proud that they have retained a membership of 60. In the '60s they had 60 dues-paying members, and "we have 60 dues-paying members now. We've lost some along the way, but we've always picked up more."

At the club's 60th anniversary celebration chaired by Bess Direnfeld-Plosker, a founding member who also chaired the club's 50th anniversary celebration, more than 100 people turned out to acknowledge the club's accomplishments.

They have travelled a long way together, she said. "We were young, mostly newlyweds, ambitious, hard-working, coping with the economics and hardships of the early war years and postwar years. We were convinced that peace and the Zionist dream were attainable."

Mekler joined Na'amat, she said, because she grew up "steeped in labour Zionism."

Her parents, members of Farbund, were founders of the Farbund Folks Shule, which later evolved into Bialik Hebrew Day School. She is a life member of the school's board and has been national president of Na'amat.

Physics teacher is tuned into new ideas

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eli Honig, a popular, white-bearded physics teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is using a Slinky toy to demonstrate "sympathetic vibrations" to a visiting reporter.

"They are our teachers..."

The Slinky is one of Honig's many teaching tools – and it's "cool," he says, using vernacular more common to his high school students.

Honig, who has a PhD from New York University, also teaches at the University of Toronto, with which he has been associated since 1973.

He made the transition to high school teacher in 1984 after a friend suggested he apply to CHAT. "I didn't know what I was getting into," he recalls. "Actually, I was very fortunate. I enjoyed it a lot. The kids that year were wonderful – flying off the walls practically, [but] bright. I had a great time."

Also, he noted, his new colleagues helped him learn the ropes.

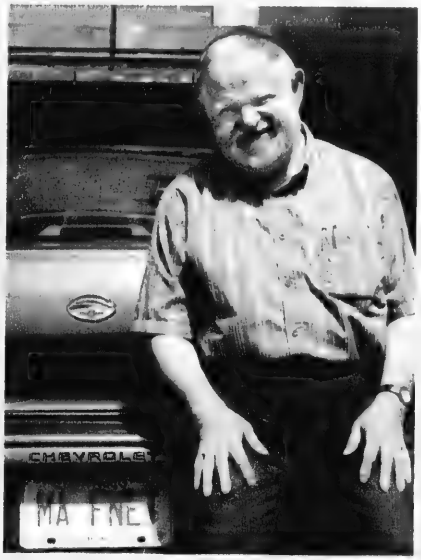
In 2004, he won a teacher of excellence award, a private award for teachers at Toronto Jewish day schools, and this year he received CHAT's Aviva Heller Memorial Award from its student council.

The 62-year-old educator, who has four grown children, was born in France and immigrated to Montreal with his mother and two sisters at age six. His father perished in Auschwitz; the others stayed in hiding with the help of a French family.

A graduate of Montreal's Baron Byng High School, Honig also attended Lubavitch Day School from grades 5 to 8, a significant factor in his becoming Orthodox.

At CHAT, Honig is known for his connection to Canada's Wonderland. In the late 1980s, Honig spoke of the Vaughan theme park during a class, telling his Grade 13 students that if they went there, they would see an example of a principle he was explaining.

One student called out, "Why don't we take a field trip?" Honig's reaction was a neutral comment. "Interesting idea," he said, not taking it seriously at first.



Eli Honig's licence plate, a gift from one of his classes, proclaims Newton's second law of motion: mass times acceleration equals net force. [Benji Feldman photo]

But after thinking it over, he approached his principal to make a case for visiting the park. "That was certainly not conventional at the time," he recalls.

The trip turned out to be a success. After the group met with Wonderland's then chief engineer, Honig showed students how the rides exemplified their lessons. Those who wanted could go on the rides and "study the physics from within." Some students built ride models, a project Honig eventually assigned all his students.

He also became involved in organizing an annual high school physics day at the park.

To create some fun in the classroom, teachers have to have a sense of humour, Honig said. "You have to like kids, and opportunities will present themselves. Of course you plan your lessons, and try to come up with new ideas.

"My wife knows not to throw out stuff in the house, because it may be useful," he said, noting that he had used a cardboard roll from a package of aluminum foil, along with a tuning fork, to demonstrate resonance.

"I don't plan these things," he said. "They just happen to catch my eye. It's serendipity."

Na'amat president a 'new' member

"I belonged to Habonim Dror, Na'amat's youth organization, as a youngster, and I met my husband there. I would have been a traitor had I not joined. It was in my genes."

Current president Tillie Margolis, who is also president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, is a "new" member who joined in 1950. She says the group has lasted all these years because the members have dedicated themselves to a cause. It becomes a way of life.

"We've given a lot: our members were instrumental in developing some major Na'amat projects. We have received back even more, however."

With the fundraising skills she developed through her chapter, she said, she went on to become fundraising co-ordinator for the Canadian Cancer Society.

"We learned to do public speaking, to be organized and to mediate. When you deal with a lot of people, you learn to be diplomatic. If you run an organization, you can certainly run a business."

The social aspect is also important, said Margolis. "We are bonded together through friendship and through the cause."

Mekler said that due to their achievements, "people listen to us when we speak, and young groups have respect for us.

"When we were a young group, we would emulate the older members. Now, the younger members are emulating us. That is the way things work."

U of W medical student writes more than just prescriptions

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Playwright and doctor are two adjectives that are not usually used to describe one person, but in Josh Landy's case, they fit the bill.

Josh Landy

Landy, an aspiring physician about to begin his fourth year in medical school at the University of Western Ontario, has found a way to marry his two passions: medicine and writing.

When he became interested in medical ethics, he decided to do a research project that gave him the "chance to do some writing and thinking – it was important to do some research in a field that gave me that freedom."

Landy spoke to Dr. Jeff Nisker, the medical ethics co-ordinator and professor of obstetrics-gynecology and oncology in the Schulich School of Medicine at UWO, who encouraged him to apply for a grant from the Associated Medical Services.

"I applied for a studentship and they awarded me a grant for my proposal to write a play about medical students and the ethics we face as students.

"The application also discussed my plans to develop the play as a tool to help contextualize a lot of the didactic ethics that we meet in school," said the 24-year-old Thornhill native.

Nisker suggested Landy look to the medical ethics projects of the second- and fourth-year students for inspiration.

Landy explained that the second-year projects, which are part of the ethics curriculum, are put together by groups of eight to 10 students "and they are presented in any fashion about any medical ethical issue that doesn't sit right."

He said that the topics ranged from end-of-life care to screening patients.

The fourth-year projects were accounts of personal experiences from the ward – the students wrote about any situation that made them feel ethically uncomfortable.

"Some of these writing samples were able to elicit such a visceral reaction from me, they conjure such vivid images," Landy said.

"Basically, Morning Grounds was inspired by what makes us, as medical students, uncomfortable."

On the surface, Landy said, the play is about two medical students who set up a coffee stand in the hallway of a hospital. Throughout the play, the characters run into people they know while serving coffee.

"Ethically, it's about the decisions we make as medical students and how those choices affect the way we change our perspectives through school. It's about that adaptation, and how medical school changes people."

He first presented his play at the Ontario Medical Educators Network conference in London, Ont., last May and got a reaction he didn't expect.

"I truly expected polite applause and a hasty exit from the crowd," he recalled. "I was shocked by the genuine enthusiasm and the lengthy [question and answer period] that followed. Teachers were asking me about these issues. I felt so humbled by that experience."

He then took his play to another forum, Congress 2005, the annual conference of the Canadian Federation for the Humanities and Social Sciences, held at UWO from May 28 to July 5.

He explained that each evening, one of the selected humanities projects were performed. "Most of the projects were single effort at things like poetry and music, but the play was a nice change because it had a cast of 12 characters and it drew interest from both the students and the conference."

Landy, who went through the Jewish school system, first at Associated Hebrew School, then at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), said he didn't always want to be a doctor.

"It's been my goal since I've been in high school. I got a C in science in junior high. That was a rough patch for my relationship with science. We've been close ever since," Landy said, displaying his sense of humour.

Rabbi Witty: in appreciation of a dear friend

By RABBI ERWIN SCHILD
on behalf of the Toronto Board of Rabbis

I cannot recall my first meeting with Rabbi Yitzchak Witty, of blessed memory. I assume it took place soon after he became director of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. A much more recent encounter always comes up in my mind when I think of him, and the encounter had nothing to do with our respective positions in the Jewish community.

My wife and I were spending a Shabbat in Bergenfield, N.J., visiting my nephew David Schild and his family. Entering shul on Friday evening, a few minutes before the start of the service, I saw a gentleman sitting in a quiet corner, obviously engrossed in a book, his face averted from my perspective. He looked unmistakably like Yitz Witty, with his ample proportions and posture, but as we were 700 kilometres away from Toronto, I thought it could not possibly be him. Well, it was, my nephew assured me: Rabbi Witty had a daughter in Bergenfield and was, therefore, a frequent and appreciated guest of the community.

We greeted each other with the special kind of exquisite joy that one experiences only at a moment of surprise when one unexpectedly meets a good friend far from home. I felt the openness, the cordiality, the unreserved friendliness, the genuine reaching out to others so characteristic of his personality. He was not only a revered colleague, but a dear friend.

An obituary of Rabbi Witty in the press designated him as "the father of Jewish education in Toronto." That accolade was incorrect. The fathers (and mothers) of Jewish education in Toronto predated Rabbi Witty by at least one generation or two. Rabbi Witty was the champion, the advocate, the developer, the propulsive energizer of Jewish education in our community. Yet, like most of the great pacemakers and leaders of the public, he stood on the shoulders of devoted predecessors.

It was Dr. Joseph Diamond who created and shaped the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE) as its first director. He won for Jewish education the priority position on the agenda of the organized Jewish community that it still occupies. Diamond was an authority in the field of Jewish learning and education and, most importantly, a pioneering and demanding administrator. But while Diamond was respected in the boardrooms of the community, he remained somewhat aloof and remote, whereas Rabbi Witty was a people person – warm, effusive, gregarious, outgoing and, well, likeable.

Rabbi Witty could have had a brilliant career as a congregational rabbi. He loved people. He was a genuine scholar of Torah and well versed in many academic disciplines. He was an eloquent speaker who could hold an audience. He possessed a terrific sense of humour and would delight friends, colleagues and audiences with a wealth of stories and anecdotes. He had initiative and endurance, was creative and original. He was charming, persuasive, sensible and sensitive, resourceful and dedicated. He was popular and beloved. He exemplified many of the virtues that characterize a true scholar, a talmid chacham: he was modest and moderate, peaceful and helpful, unassuming and gentle, truly devout and steadfast.

However, much as he loved humanity, the Jewish people, God and Torah, his passion was Jewish education for all Jewish children. With a large measure of success, he dedicated himself to the creation of an educators' community beyond the formal constituents of the board, a community that included teachers, students, principals, rabbis and patrons.

Without sacrificing his own principles or compromising his convictions as an Orthodox Jew, Rabbi Witty was able to serve the entire community, irrespective of ideological or theological differences, with love and boundless dedication. In the same transdenominational spirit, Rabbi Witty was a loyal and active member of the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR). It was in this context that I came to know, appreciate and admire Rabbi Yitz Witty and to enjoy his unconditional collegiality and friendship. What a wonderful, talented, erudite rav and chaver he was!

For reasons that I understand and respect, but do not endorse, Toronto's Orthodox rabbis have chosen not to join their Reform and Conservative colleagues on the TBR. Yitz Witty was the only exception, save one other Orthodox rabbi who served a Conservative congregation. It was not the communality of his office as director of the BJE that made Rabbi Witty join: for many years, he was the active secretary of the TBR and quite plausibly its leading spirit, able to weld together the sometimes fractious and always busy members of the TBR and to spearhead their collective activities. His unique position, and unimpeachable Orthodox credentials, allowed him also to serve as a bridge between the TBR and the Orthodox rabbinate when communal needs required it. His commitment to the TBR exemplified the width of his vision and the scope of his devotion to the community as a whole.

With great pleasure, I recall Rabbi Witty's weekly talks on Zelda Young's Jewish Hour. Whenever I had the chance to listen to him, frequently en route to a gravestone unveiling on a Sunday morning, I enjoyed his erudition, wit, insight and scholarship as he so effectively delivered his informative and fascinating mini-lectures.

Even after his retirement from the BJE, Yitz Witty did not curb his dedication to the needs of the global Jewish community. I recall his several visits to Australia as a lecturer and his years of service, at great personal sacrifice, to the Jewish community of Milwaukee, Wis. As director of the Albert Latner Jewish Library in his later years, Rabbi Witty brought a new sense of vitality and relevance to this important, but undervalued, institution.

Yitzchak Witty's commanding presence at a meeting, in the pulpit, or at a convivial gathering, was matched by his role as a private individual and family man. His presence was inseparably tied – soul to soul, as the Torah calls it – to Shulamit, his wife, partner, companion and caregiver. In the name of my colleagues on the TBR, I would like to convey to her the sympathy and solidarity of a shared loss, shared sorrow and shared affection. Our condolences reach out also to his children and grandchildren. Those who brought him joy and happiness in his lifetime will continue, we pray, to bring perpetual lustre to his memory.

For the TBR, the remembrance of Yitzchak Witty will always be a challenge to realize his goal of a united and effective rabbinate.

Coast to Coast

Bertrand charged for comments

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Quebec Bar Association has charged lawyer Guy Bertrand with two violations of the profession's code of ethics in connection with his defence of Rwandan exile Leon Mugesera before the Supreme Court of Canada.

The charges were laid by the syndic of the bar, which has been investigating Bertrand since the Supreme Court condemned Bertrand in June for employing anti-Semitic sentiment in his attempt to stay proceedings against his client. The Supreme Court called it "scandalous" to allege that "influential members of the Jewish community manipulated the Canadian political system and the country's highest court for the sole purpose of having Mugesera deported."

The bar's two charges are that Bertrand made a public statement "prejudicial to a case pending before a court" and "lacked moderation by making arguments and statements that were irresponsible, excessive and unjustified by the set of circumstances and facts."

If the charges are upheld by the bar's disciplinary committee, Bertrand faces sanctions ranging from a reprimand to a fine to, in the worst case, expulsion for life.

No date has yet been set for the bar's disciplinary committee to begin hearings against Bertrand, an outspoken Quebec City lawyer who has been practising for some 40 years.

Bertrand was defiant at a press conference he called to react to the bar's decision. He said that he looks forward to the opportunity to explain what happened and to defend his conduct.

He denied that he ever spoke of a "Jewish conspiracy" or made any other anti-Semitic remarks, but rather denounced the action of a "lobby group," referring to Canadian Jewish Congress. He said the court appeared to have picked up the conspiracy theory from an editorial in the Globe and Mail.

He also charged that the Supreme Court exceeded its power in condemning his handling of the Mugesera case. The judges "abused their enormous power" in condemning him without going him a hearing or opportunity of appeal.

"These judges… knocked me and attacked my honour and my dignity without any of them thinking of giving me at least the benefit of the doubt, good faith or the presumption of innocence."

He was also critical of the bar. Its refusal to defend him after the Supreme Court judgment, Bertrand said, raises the question of whether lawyers in private practice should form a professional association or union to protect themselves.

He said lawyers are becoming reluctant to take on controversial cases for fear of being "crucified" by the court for something they might say and then they have no recourse of defence.

Coast to Coast

Peaceful rally held in Montreal park

He called the pullout a violation of human rights and of Jewish law, which he said forbids endangering any Jew by giving back land that was given to them by God for eternity.

"I have heard many arguments that we should not be here, that it is too late. But it is not any more late than going to a shivah," said the event's MC Murray Dalfen, who said terrorism should not be "rewarded" and no further territorial concession should be made.

"They say we have no right because we do not live in Israel… But we are asked at other times to raise money for Israel and to speak publicly on her behalf, to show an interest in our homeland. Tonight, we are expressing our deep concern for what is happening in our homeland," Dalfen said.

"A Palestinian state in Gaza will be a terrorist entity, with the sole purpose of capturing Eretz Israel, and [it will be] an anti-American dictatorship."

Rabbi David Sabbah, who is regarded as the spiritual leader of much of the Sephardi community, circulated a signed flyer stating that "it is forbidden, under any circumstances, to hand over parts of Israel to the Arabs."

It cited a passage from the Shulchan Aruch (Code of Jewish Law) that permits Jews to desecrate Shabbat and use weapons against "heathens" invading a border area.

The event in the park was peaceful, a mixture of the solemn and almost festive, with a barbecue and infants in strollers. A few people in the crowd wore orange, the colour of the pullout resisters.

Several people interviewed said they had come out of sympathy for the settlers, not as a protest. "I support the Israeli government and believe in respect for the rule of law," said Aaron Remer. "But we still have an obligation to publicly express our feelings for those Jews whose lives are being uprooted."

There were no Israeli flags, nor was Hatikvah sung. The evening concluded with the singing of Sheybaneh Beit Hamikdash, which expresses the hope of rebuilding the Temple in Jerusalem.

The most forceful speaker and the one who received the most applause was Rabbi Avrohom Jacks of Congregation Zichron Kedoshim, who painted a disturbing picture of the crackdown on resisters and the physical removal of residents. "This is the first time in history that synagogues have been destroyed by Jewish soldiers."

He alleged that the Israeli government has spent $3 billion on the disengagement, money that has been taken away from social spending, resulting in "thousands of abused children being returned to their homes."

Landy hopes to keep writing

Landy, who will be graduating in May 2006, has an ambition to specialize in general internal medicine, a field that specializes in diseases involving internal organs and the interactions they have with each other.

But that doesn't mean he is going to stop writing plays or promoting Morning Grounds.

"I'm working on something right now that isn't ethics-related. I will continue to work on Morning Grounds because I would like to see it taken further into the medical community," he said.

"The reason why this play is so important to me is because there does not exist a curriculum of medical ethics that is built with the students in mind. We can't be taught as doctors because we're not doctors. Not yet. The student perspective is different and it is an important one."

Residents mark final hours at Netzarim, last Gaza settlement

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NETZARIM — Residents of Netzarim, the last of the 21 Gaza Strip settlements to be evacuated, gathered in their synagogue Monday morning for a final service before leaving the enclave later in the day.

The era of settlement in the Gaza Strip was to come to an end with the evacuation of the embattled settlement, the target of countless Palestinian terror attacks and the enclave which many had believed would be dismantled before all others.

In the synagogue, residents prayed together with the soldiers who guarded them over the years, before leaving with the Torah scrolls cradled in the arms of Netzarim old-timers.

The settlers then carried the synagogue's menorah – which had earlier been removed from the roof – on their shoulders through the streets of Netzarim.

At the conclusion of the service, they were to board armoured buses that were initially to go to the Western Wall in Jerusalem. The settlement had 80 veteran families, along with 20 families of newcomers, about 500 people in all.

Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Dan Halutz visited Netzarim early Monday to meet with leaders of the settlement, who promised to work to prevent violence during the evacuation.

But the settlement officials added that there was a group of youths who had infiltrated into the settlement, and that the young protesters might not abide by the "ground rules" agreed upon by the army and the residents.

Settlers called police overnight to arrest and eject three activists who had written slogans on walls, including: "Sharon, Hitler is proud of you" and "[Rabin assassin] Yigal Amir, we need you."

The three, who were found with paint, flammable liquids and tire-puncturing spikes, are a part of a group of up to six activists who apparently entered the settlement in the trunks of cars.

Netzarim has long been a symbol and flashpoint for Israelis and Palestinians. Isolated and hard to defend, the enclave at times experienced daily Palestinian rifle and grenade fire. Settlers placed signs throughout Israel proclaiming, "It is at Netzarim that Israel will triumph."

In the first month of the intifadah, Netzarim junction was the site of an Israeli-Palestinian exchange of fire that claimed the life of 12-year-old Muhammed Dura, the central Palestinian icon of the uprising.

Netzarim was also seen as significant because of a public statement made by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon prior to the announcement of the disengagement plan, when he said, "The fate of Netzarim will be the fate of Tel Aviv."

"We knew this day would come, but we will get over it and move on," said Netzarim Rabbi Eyal Vered of the evacuation. "We will win, but not with force. God forbid that blood will be spilled."

IDF Maj.-Gen. Dan Harel, overall military commander of the Gaza Strip pullout, indicated that he believed the Monday evacuation of Netzarim would proceed smoothly.

"Its brave residents have withstood years under the threat of terrorism, shoulder to shoulder with us. Both the residents of Netzarim and we paid with lives in defending the settlement," Harel said in remarks broadcast Monday.

"I am acquainted with the people of Netzarim. They are excellent people, people with values, and I know that the evacuation will be dignified, in a manner which is worthy also of them."

The army and police Sunday completed the evacuation of settlers from Slav, Katif, Dugit, Neveh Dekalim, Atzmona, Elei Sinai and Nisanit. The security forces did not meet any major opposition from the evacuees.

Residents of Katif, along with the soldiers who came to evacuate them, held a tearful final worship service Sunday before boarding buses and cars to leave the settlement. A parallel prayer service was held at the settlement of Atzmona, at the southern end of Gush Katif.

One of those who took the Torah scrolls out of the synagogue at the conclusion of the prayers was school principal David Hatuel, whose wife Tali and four daughters were killed in a Palestinian terror ambush last year.

Soldiers who arrived at Katif in the pre-dawn hours found the gates locked, as youths smoking cigarettes loitered around piles of flammable materials such as hay, tires and wooden planks, preparing for resistance.

Despite massive bales of straw set ablaze at the entrance to Katif in a bid to delay the evacuation, columns of police entered the settlement with the help of a bulldozer at around 10 a.m. Sunday.

On Katif's gate, scorched from a large protest fire that blazed in the morning, residents hung a sign that read: "We shall return soon."

Stiff resistance had been expected from some 1,000 residents and hundreds of illegal infiltrators still in some of the settlements, but no major opposition was met by the forces.

Closely following the evacuations, bulldozers Sunday razed more than 30 homes in Nissanit and Dugit in the northern Gaza Strip, marking the first large-scale demolitions during the disengagement.

Shortly afterward, house demolitions began in the Gush Katif settlement of Pe'at Sadeh.

More than 200 bulldozers are now in Gush Katif awaiting demolition orders.

'All for some divine purpose'

She believes that all that's happened – the trauma of evacuation, the broken homes, the lives torn asunder – are all for some divine purpose.

Perhaps, she suggests, it is to show Israelis they should not be doing this to fellow Jews. "It might be the pain of losing this land will teach the Jewish people that this is not the way to give away land. Only when there is a leader who is truly Jewish and truly cares about the way of God will Israel be a safe country and Israel can live as it's meant to live, without fear," she said.

The same faith that sees a silver lining in the evacuation was what brought her and Avi to Gush Katif in the first place. Persoff, who grew up in Toronto as Shira Tepperman, attended Ulpanat Orot high school. She first moved to Israel seven years ago with fellow classmates to continue their studies for an additional year. Unlike her contemporaries who returned to Toronto, she decided to stay.

"I fell in love," she told her parents, Shauna and Jerry, but not with a boy. "I fell in love with the country."

While she was continuing her studies to become a teacher, her friends arranged a date with another student, a native of Jerusalem who was studying in Gush Katif under Harav Shmuel Tal, the rosh yeshiva there. Romance blossomed, and 2½ years ago they were married in Kedumim in northern Samaria, where Shira was studying. They later moved to Gush Katif.

"I was more than a little bit nervous to go to a place that was kind of dangerous," she admitted. "But I was in love with my husband. I trusted him and his judgement."

Life in Gush Katif had its blessings – many, she said. Not only were the people warm and welcoming, but they felt part of a community that formed around her husband's yeshiva. What's more, they had a nice apartment, something like a Toronto townhouse, they could see the Mediterranean and they could feel the sea breeze.

While Avi continued his studies for a sixth year, Shira settled in as an English teacher. She admits the danger of living in Gaza sometimes got to her. She hasn't had a good night sleep in quite a while. Palestinian missiles frequently targeted the community. One landed in her backyard and the shrapnel took out the air conditioner. Her neighbour's home was hit by a projectile. One neighbour was hurt, another killed.

When people asked why they remained in such a dangerous place, her answer was: "When you are doing something that is a mitzvah from God, that's the most important thing. We trust God that whatever happens was meant to happen."

As farmers grew produce in soil that local Arabs and Bedouin called "the land of ghosts, because nothing would grow there," she thought the Jews' agricultural success came because they were fulfilling biblical prophecy in tending the land.

Thirty years ago, the Israeli government encouraged settlement of the area. The house the Persoffs lived in was built when Sharon was the minister in charge of housing and construction.

The country had once supported the Gazans' efforts and she felt that prayer and an education campaign, embarked upon by settlers a year ago, would convince other Israelis to see the biblical reasons for remaining in Gaza. Sharon, she hoped, would have to backtrack.

Today she is disappointed, but not in the people of Israel. They are not to blame for the evacuation, she said. The country's elite – the prime minister, most of the Knesset, the judiciary – favour it, while most Israelis are uninformed of the religious reasons to remain in Gaza, she added.

Shira said she felt shock and pain at the realization she and her husband would have to leave their home. In a display of passive resistance, they did not open the door when 17 soldiers arrived to demand their departure. "We decided beforehand that if the soldiers came, we'd sing [Ani Ma'amin (I Believe)] and lock the door and they'd have to feel the pain a little bit for what they were doing," she said.

Two female soldiers entered and told them to pack up. After saying goodbye to their neighbours, Shira, who is expecting a second child soon, grasped Emunah and left unescorted. Avi, meanwhile, sat limp and forced two soldiers to carry him out, one propping him up under each arm.

'Israel is a very strong democracy'

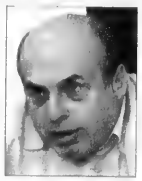
Abandoning the quid pro quo approach, Arad suggested, will "raise Palestinians' expectations for more Israeli concessions, relieve the Palestinians of the need for reciprocity, and encourage them to 'stick to their guns.'

"Any new prime minister who wants to revert to negotiations based on the immutability of the two principles will now have a hard time."

Arad stated that he is not opposed to disengagement. "We could have gained certain quid pro quos that would have made disengagement worthwhile. This disengagement process was a bad deal."

A self-styled, hard-boiled pragmatist, Arad could not find any constructive message out of this disengagement process other than perhaps the general observation that going through hardship usually hardens and makes the sufferer wiser. "But why," Arad asked rhetorically, "did we have to inflict such hardships upon ourselves to become smarter? Let's wait and see. The jury is still out."

David Horovitz



Natan Sharansky

On the emotional debate raging around the disengagement Arad, spoke with an eye to history and to the Tisha b'Av observance that had concluded earlier in the week. "Infighting has always cost us dearly in our history. Jerusalem fell because of fratricide, Those of us who want to preserve the 'third temple,' i.e., Israel, are trying to encourage healthy and democratic debate. We have to preserve that which unifies rather than that which divides us."

* * *

The need for social cohesion was a theme that former cabinet minister in the Sharon government, Natan Sharansky, now a Senior Fellow at the Shalem Center, an academic research institute in Jerusalem, would speak about as well.

Sharansky left the cabinet to protest the disengagement plan. Not surprisingly, he expressed his concerns to The CJN.

"Disengagement will bring an increase in terror and it delegitimizes our case regarding the settlements. Under the Oslo Accords, settlements were to be dealt with as the last item."

Sharansky emphasized that he believes in a democratic state for the Palestinians, "but unilateral moves by Israel do not help them achieve that goal."

When asked why Sharon decided on his unilateral course of action, Sharansky said the prime minister "felt desperate because of the injustice of the world's reaction to Israel."

I asked Sharansky whether he agreed with disengagement opponents who said the process was undemocratic. He responded emphatically.

"I do not agree with those who claim that the disengagement proves Israel is not a democracy.

"Israel is a very strong democracy. The people believe in democracy. Indeed, the groups demonstrating against the disengagement are among the champions of that democracy.

"The issue of democracy turns on the question whether we have the tools in our system to fight for our views.The tools do exist, but they were not used. Some of the people who were opposed to him refused to stop him. Israel does not lack for the proper instruments of democracy."

Though disappointed, the former minister for Diaspora affairs did not appear stymied or at a loss in defining the next major challenge to Israeli society.

"After a period of time, when these stormy days subside, we must engage in self-searching concerning our relations to each other. There is also room now for an analysis of the criteria for refining the democratic process, for example, introducing greater accountability for the members of parliament.

"We must remember that we are still in the process of rebuilding ourselves as a nation. Working together and respecting each other is very important. Both 'camps' have to make concessions towards each other.

"We can survive only together and we can survive only if we stick to our Zionist ideals.

"What unites us is by far more important than what divides us. Those who separate themselves from one group of Jews will one day separate themselves from the entire group."

David Hazony

Yossi Klein Halevi

David Horovitz, the energetic editor of the Jerusalem Post, also spoke of his concern for the stresses and strains upon Israel's society.

"Sharon made a lot of mistakes in the political process, failing to act in the spirit of democracy, as some of his accusers said. The decision [to disengage from Gaza] was certainly democratic but the process raised questions.

"On the other side, however, some people led an unconscionable campaign. 'One Jew does not expel another Jew' was an unsubtle call to disobey orders. That was a terrible mistake. If their opposition had been merely non-violent, without resort to the call to disobey orders, it would have been an affirmation of shared values."

But of course many of the anti-disengagement opponents clung fiercely to the hope that soldiers would refuse to obey orders. And this caused Horovitz to worry about the consequences.

"Israel has withstood horrible terrorism and all manner of external threats during these past years, but the internal threat is the most dangerous.

"We must respect each other's differences. Israel and Diaspora Jewry agonize because the dilemmas we face are so acute, so compelling. We must respect the fact that people with whom we disagree are also interested in the well-being of Israel.

"The consequences of tearing ourselves apart are far greater than the consequences of the physical dangers we face."

David Hazony, the young editor-in-chief of Azure: Ideas for the Jewish Nation, a quarterly publication of the Shalem Center, echoed Horovitz's observations but was able to find some encouraging signs emerging in the disengagement fallout.

"A lot of bad tactics [were used] by both sides in the debate.

"The settlement movement failed in trying to bring mainstream Israelis along to understanding their concerns and the government failed to take advantage of full democracy. A referendum could have been persuasive to those who were not unalterably opposed to withdrawal under any conditions.

"Sharon is not a glowing example of a 'democratic' leader. For him, politics is a way of setting up a mechanism, and he takes advantage of the mechanism to achieve his purposes. He is a roughshod person."

But Hazony sees the emergence now of what he called "a pro-unity backlash." He pointed for example, to a campaign of ads that have appeared in Ma'ariv, featuring the slogan ovrim et zeh b'yachad (we will get over this together). "The ad reinforces the unity of the people.

"We have scared ourselves," Hazony said. "This is something that is excruciatingly painful. And certain historical memories such as Tisha b'Av and the Altalena incident, are driving the agony of fear of anything that might look like civil war.

"There is a massive centre in the country that wants to do anything and everything possible to avoid such a thing.

"With the collapse of the Oslo Accords, the ideologies of both national camps – of the right and the left – started to come together. Each camp compromised. There would not be an Eretz Hashlema [a Greater Land of Israel] nor peace at all costs.

"Proof exists even in today's crisis, with the blue banners that say, 'We are separating from Aza but returning to Zionism.'

"The balloons of both camps have been deflated. And the government, media and the left have stopped demonizing the settlers.

"No doubt this has been a major wound, but I believe there will be healing and I see the beginning signs of that healing."

On the day that the forced evictions of settlers began, I met with Yossi Klein Halevi, a Senior Fellow at the Shalem Center, and an author and commentator whose powerfully insightful essays appear in The New Republic and other prestigious publications.

When we met, he had just heard the news that a woman had immolated herself to protest the disengagement. Tears welled in his eyes as we spoke. It was clearly a hard day for him, as it was for most Israelis on either side of the disengagement debate. During our conversation, he received two calls from a friend and colleague who was in Morag, one of he communities being evacuated in Gaza.

"He was crying," Halevi said of his friend. "He described how he had just helped one of the settlers leave, how he embraced him, how they both walked together arm on arm."

As Halevi spoke, he sighed, stopping to find just the right word to explain the emotions obviously swirling within. He was worried for the future of the country and said so.

"I don't understand the images I see on TV. We are living in a time where anything can happen… It is part of the dread. There is a profound alienation and cynicism in the country that are terrifying."

But the soft-spoken writer has not yet surrendered to that cynicism. "I still trust Sharon. Average Israelis have not forgotten who Sharon is. But at crucial moments he acted out of interest for the country and at crucial moments he acted to save the country."

The more Halevi spoke about his anxieties, the more he was able to recover his emotional compass and find the uplifting language and bull's eye insight that have become his trademark.

"It is one of the privileges of my life that I live here, to be part of this society, to understand, to empathize [with fellow citizens], to try to repair the pain, lift the hardship, simply contribute to the overall well-being."

Later that evening, Rabbi Haim Sabato, the head of the Yeshiva Bircat Moshe in Ma'aleh Adumim, expressed in theological terms the same thought as Halevi had

The cherubic teacher/scholar is an award-winning author, whose books are very popular throughout the population at large.

He refused to speak directly on political subjects, per se. But he spoke eloquently, even poetically about his confidence in the people of Israel to rise above any and all travails. He searches the past for encouragement in the present.

Rabbi Haim Sabato

"The people of Israel have returned to the historic Land of Israel to build a home in the land of its birth. This journey of return has brought with it many trials, but it has brought with it many celebration as well.

"The process has been one of renewal. From the depths of the Shoah to the rebirth of the people in its own land. The latter represents the pinnacle, the heights of achievement.

"We have confronted evil. And we have had to endure all manner of hardships and difficult moments. We have relied on our faith and our beliefs."

Rav Sabato is confident that the differences among the conflicted groupings within the country will be resolved.

"Our common underpinning – Jewish history, the vision of the prophets, the literature of our sages – is much stronger than all the external threats and internal struggles.

" I have no doubt that our fundamental internal sense of unity will triumph over the external factors that threaten to tear us apart."

He recalled the atmosphere of the country before the 1967 war. "The people were divided. But in one instant, everything changed. We became united. The liberation of Jerusalem united us even more.

Sabato recalled the revolutionary aspect of those heady days after the Six Day War. "People began to speak in terms of faith and use expressions of belief and spirit. Distant people became closer."

Seven years later, he participated in the Yom Kippur War. "We fought together, shoulder to shoulder, hesder yeshiva soldier alongside the non-observant kibbutznik to defend the people in its land. We also prayed together and recited chapters of Psalms together.

"I saw with my own eyes this sense of untiy and togetherness. I know for certain that this will be the same during these days [during and after disengagement]."

"Who we are as a people is not necessarily how we are portrayed in the media. The images are often contradictory – one of ugliness as opposed to one of beauty, a beauty instilled in us over generations through the values of our faith as conveyed to our children through education.

"Education is a long, hard road, with disappointments, frustrations and tensions along the way, but it is the only way to direct the people to its Jewish sources and through the Jewish sources to build a society based upon honesty, justice, purity of the soul and temimut (total sincerity).

"I know that I risk being criticized as being naive, but I believe that unbending belief in our morality and ethics as individuals and as a people is the great strength we summon to overcome all problems."

Blame me, Sharon says

Ariel Sharon begged Gaza Strip settlers not to scuffle with Israeli forces who evict them. "I would like to appeal to everyone not to attack the police and soldiers and not to blame them or make things difficult for them," the Israeli prime minister told reporters last week as the army began forced removals of Gaza settlers. "I am responsible for this. Attack me. Blame me," he said. Sitting with Sharon, President Moshe Katsav interjected that by "attack," Sharon meant verbal criticism. Sharon said the sight of settler evacuations was "heart-rending" for him, and he praised the majority of settlers who did not resist violently.

Rocket lands in Eilat

A Katyusha rocket, one of three launched from Jordan, landed near the Eilat airport last Friday. The rocket created a small crater on a local road, but didn't explode. Another rocket landed near a U.S. Navy battleship docked in Aqaba, Jordan, killing a Jordanian soldier. No Americans were hurt. Jordanian and Israeli police investigated the incident together. The attack was launched from a warehouse rented by four people holding Egyptian and Iraqi citizenship, Associated Press reported. An Al Qaeda-linked group claimed responsibility.

Settler kills 4 Palestinians

An Israeli settler killed four Palestinians in the West Bank last week as Israel continued its withdrawal from Gaza and part of the West Bank. Police said the man grabbed a gun from a security guard in the industrial zone of the settlement Shiloh Aug. 17 and opened fire on Palestinian workers, killing four and wounding one. The man, a resident of the nearby settlement Shvut Rachel, was arrested and disarmed. He told police he hoped his attack would stop the pullout. Hamas threatened retaliation. An aide to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon contacted the Palestinian Authority to condemn the attack and ask the PA to help keep calm in the territories.

Immigrants heckle Olmert

North American immigrants to Israel heckled Deputy Prime Minster Ehud Olmert when he met them Aug. 17 on their arrival in Israel. The immigrants were protesting Israel's withdrawal from Gaza, the Jerusalem Post reported. The 250 immigrants arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport in the latest wave of what is predicted to be the most North American immigrants to Israel since 1983. The flight was sponsored by Nefesh b'Nefesh and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Settler sets herself on fire

An Israeli woman set herself on fire to protest the Gaza withdrawal. The West Bank settler, said to be in her 50s or 60s, doused herself with gasoline and ignited herself at a police checkpoint in southern Israel on Aug 17. A police spokesperson said she was admitted to a hospital with 60 per cent of her body burned, and described the incident as a politically motivated suicide attempt. Also last week, a woman stabbed a soldier with an IV needle near a shul in the settlement of Morag, Ha'aretz reported.

Hamas gloats over pullout

Hamas said the Gaza Strip withdrawal is the "beginning of the end" of Israel. "Today it is Gaza, tomorrow it will be the West Bank, and later it will be all of the land," Khaled Meshaal, the politburo chief of the Islamic terrorist group, said in an interview with London-based Al-Hayat newspaper published Aug. 16. "It is the beginning of the end of Israel." Hamas scaled back its attacks at the behest of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, but it vows new violence after the pullout. Meshaal ruled out disarmament, in defiance of the "road map" peace plan.

Sharon, Israel draw praise from world leaders

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CRAWFORD, Texas — The White House last week praised Israel's pullout from the Gaza Strip as a bold move that will strengthen ties between Israel and the United States.

U.S. President George W. Bush sympathizes with settlers who are being forced to evacuate their homes, said White House spokesperson Dana Perino, adding that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was "very courageous" to carry out the withdrawal.

"We agree that the disengagement will make Israel stronger," Perino told reporters. "We agree with Prime Minister Sharon on that and the president has also said that this will bring our two countries closer together."

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that while she feels for the settlers, Israel will be expected to make further concessions that will ultimately lead to a Palestinian state.

"Everyone empathizes with what the Israelis are facing," Rice said, adding, "It cannot be Gaza only."

In an interview with the New York Times, Rice said the Palestinian Authority must move quickly to disarm Palestinian factions intent on breaking the current ceasefire with Israel.

She also said she expects Israel and the Palestinians to take further steps toward the creation of a Palestinian state, including loosening travel restrictions in the West Bank and withdrawing from more Palestinian cities.

Rice called the pullout "quite a dramatic moment in the history of the Middle East" and said Sharon is "enormously courageous."

Rice has visited the region twice recently to ensure the withdrawal proceeds smoothly.

In Ottawa, Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew praised both the Israeli and Palestinian leaders for showing "very mature leadership" during the pullout.

"These are very important days, historical days, that could really lead to substantial progress," he told Canadian Press last week after a speech to the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair also praised Sharon.

"I greatly admire the courage with which you have developed and implemented this policy. I believe you are right to see disengagement as an historic opportunity to pursue a better future for Israelis and Palestinians," Blair wrote in a letter to his Israeli counterpart.

In South Africa, President Thabo Mbeki congratulated Sharon.

"We salute your courage and assure you of our support as you dismantle the Jewish settlements in Gaza and the West Bank," Mbeki said in a letter to Sharon. He added that the sacrifice of the settlers, "painful as it undoubtedly is, opens the way to the implementation of the critically important Israel-Palestine 'road map' to peace, co-operation and friendship. It must surely strike a mighty blow for an end to the violence that has claimed too many Israeli and Palestinian lives."

Looking beyond Gaza, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan lauded Sharon and said the next step is to bolster the Palestinian Authority.

"I would like to commend the courage and determination of the Israeli government in formulating and implementing the disengagement process from its inception, as well as your personal involvement and leadership," he wrote to Sharon.

"Creating an atmosphere of security and the rule of law in the Palestinian areas, building the necessary infrastructure, improving the Palestinians' quality of life and implementing the reforms in order to lay the foundations of a democratic state — these are the challenges that must be dealt with together."

Meanwhile, Iran credited the Palestinians with forcing Israel to withdraw from Gaza. "The evacuation shows that what was taken by force would not have been retrieved without resistance," Iranian state radio quoted Foreign Ministry spokesperson Hamid Reza Asefi as saying. He referred to armed Palestinian attacks during the intifadah as "legitimate resistance."

Community activist 'the epitome of selflessness'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Staff Reporter

Benjamin Shekter, a 90-year-old retired lawyer who has spearheaded many initiatives in the Hamilton Jewish community, has turned down multiple invitations to be honoured for his volunteer activities because he never wanted any accolades.

Now living in Toronto, Shekter told The CJN he was very enthusiastic about community-oriented projects for children, the elderly and the entire Jewish community of Hamilton.

"I was privileged to be there when I could help, from young children all the way to the seniors," he says, looking back on 65 years of community service.

"For me," says his daughter Rhona Shekter, "my father has been the epitome of grace, intelligence, selflessness and an unrelenting dedication to the Jewish community – he gives 100 per cent and more."

Shekter's father, James Schachter, was born in Austria. He went to New York, but wanted to settle in Montreal. Shekter says that when his father got to the border at Niagara Falls in 1908, he had only 75 cents in his pocket. The money would only take him as far as Hamilton, where he settled.

He brought his Romanian-born wife-to-be to Hamilton, and they were married in 1910.

Living through the depression, anti-Semitism and poverty, Shekter put himself through school and helped out his family by working as a musician.

As a child, he met Dorothy Taylor who lived half a block away. They went through school together and graduated from McMaster University. Dorothy went on to graduate as a social worker and Benjamin entered Osgoode Hall Law School.

"I married the love of my life in 1942 because I never wanted anyone else to be the mother of my children," Shekter says.

Benjamin Shekter

He says his parents set the pattern for his sense of communal responsibility.

"They were ardent Zionists and communal workers. I remember when Golda Meir once stayed in our home." His father started the Hebrew Free Loan and the Talmud Torah in Hamilton in 1915.

In 1940, Shekter's father had a massive stroke. "I left law school and took a job selling sewing machines door to door on commission." Within the first year, he became an assistant manager. He recalls that the company wanted him to become a manager, "but when the head office found out that I was Jewish, they turned me down and I quit."

He returned to law school after 2½ years away, earning money by playing the saxophone at the Royal Connaught Hotel in Hamilton from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. He would go to bed at 2 a.m., then get up four hours later to run to the CN station to take a train to be at Osgoode in Toronto by 9 a.m.

At 6 p.m., he would return to Hamilton for a fast meal and then head back to the hotel to perform.

He was called to the bar in 1944 and opened a general practice law office in Hamilton.

"In those days, in one day, I could deal with family law, real estate deals, incorporations, and every type of law."

In 1945, he started a floor covering business, Canadian Floor-Tex which grew to encompass many home products.

In the mid-1940s, Shekter took his first communal position on the Hamilton Jewish Social Services Agency of the Jewish federation. He became the agency's president in 1948. Two years later, he became president of the Jewish Federation of Hamilton.

His activities in Hamilton are legendary. He accepted a leadership role in the building of the Hamilton Jewish Community Centre, he organized Girl Guide groups, and in 1957 he established the Beverley Golf and Country Club, since no other golf club in the area would accept Jews.

He says his greatest challenge came in the early 1980s when he realized that his disabled father required 24-hour care.

In response, he spearheaded the building of the Shalom Village retirement home. The 52-apartment building is now a highly respected facility.

"They told me that we couldn't have a basement. So without permission, we excavated down 12 feet and the basement became the activity area for many programs. And we never heard from the government."

In 1990, the board did receive permission from the government to build a 60-bed nursing home beside Shalom Village, and Shekter became the home's first president.

He notes that it has Hamilton's only kosher restaurant.

A Polish view of I.B. Singer

Lost Landscapes: In Search of Isaac Bashevis Singer and the Jews of Poland by Agata Tuszynska (William Morrow). Translated by Madeline Levy.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Agata Tuszynska is well-known in Poland as part of a younger generation of cultural workers and intellectuals who are striving to not only rethink Polish history, but also to imagine a direction that Polish national culture might take.

She is a poet, a writer of books of non-fiction, and the recipient of the Polish Pen award for reportage. Among her interests is the tangled relationship – in history, in memory and in contemporary life – between Jews and Poles. It is this concern that is central to her excellent memoir, Lost Landscapes: In Search of Isaac Bashevis Singer and the Jews of Poland.

Norman Ravvin

The book is a hybrid of genres, with equal parts biography, personal memoir, ethnography and social history, spanning the years shortly before World War II until the early 1990s, when Tuszynska did much of her research. I.B. Singer, born near Warsaw in 1904, left Poland in 1935 with the help of his elder brother, who was already in New York. Although Singer escaped the events that destroyed Jewish Poland, Tuszynska points to the irony in the story of an escapee who continued to recreate, in work after work, the place he'd left behind, and who, in his "inner self… remained a perennial refugee, never able to abandon the two suitcases he had brought with him from Poland."

Tuszynska uncovers a similar predicament among the Holocaust survivors she talks with in Manhattan, Miami Beach, and Tel Aviv. Among the Polish Jews she meets she finds great resentment and anger, but instinctive attachment, too, to Polish literature, language, the particular street life of prewar Poland, and even the country's distinctive smells and tastes. Singer, of course, only returned to Poland via his stories and novels.

"He wrote a few stories about the lives of Jews in America," Tuszynska tells us, but "it took him over a quarter of a century to decide to do that. And he still was not certain if he really knew anything."

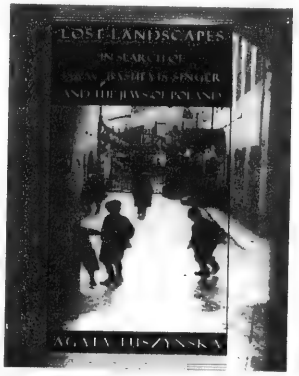
Singer's literature, then, is of a piece with the "memory books," or "yizkor bikher," created after the war to recall devastated communities and to stand in for absent gravestones.

To convey the importance of this kind of memory work, Lost Landscapes describes in detail the devastation of Singer's ancestral places. These include Leoncin, his birthplace; Bilgoraj, where his parents were married; Radzymin and its environs, where the Singer family lived for a time; and Warsaw's Krochmalna Street, where Singer's father was a poor but respected rabbi.

Tuszynska unearths what she calls "cemeteries of memory," the fragile traces of the large, centuries-old communities of central and eastern Poland. These traces include the whisper of a mark on old wooden houses where mezuzot once hung. The appearance of looted gravestones as part of the foundation of Polish houses. The stories of Poles who found what they knew to be Jewish babies abandoned in their farm fields, and kept them safe through the war. The voices of Poles – as if in a trance – remembering their Jewish childhood playmates.

In one long anecdote, remarkable for its clarity and sympathy, a woman from Tomaszow recalls prewar Jewish life, as well as the brutal, drawn-out slaughter of the town's 5,000 Jews by the occupying Germans. Tuszynska presents many such voices in Lost Landscapes, employing in her memoir an ethnographic method that attempts to capture voices, lifeways, and the unique texture of a culture through recorded interviews.

When interviewing Poles, her own voice is mute. We do not hear the questions that lead the elderly people she interviews to reveal themselves. When she talks to Jews who were once Poles, but are now known as survivors, her own persona as a Pole seeking out dialogue with Jews becomes more problematic.



For many of the people she meets, Poland is simply a graveyard, a site of betrayal and murder. Yet when she speaks Polish in a certain kind of restaurant in Tel Aviv or the Upper West Side, she finds herself buried in an avalanche of memory, as old-timers assail her, repeating, "I remember, I remember…"

Singer's career in America was not welcomed by all Jewish readers. Like Philip Roth, and Mordecai Richler in Canada, he offered a portrait of postwar life that was discomforting, an extension of his own feelings of disorientation in his new home. His characters undergo crises of faith, they live unfaithfully with one another, and many are haunted souls, trapped in bodies whose impulses they cannot control.

This was Jewish writing for the goyim, some of Singer's enemies pronounced. At the most extreme, they suggested he was nothing but a "pornographer… depicting Jews as sinners, fornicators, worthless individuals, vile creatures." Tuszynska patiently hears out these denouncements of her literary hero, but one senses in her response an attentiveness to the peculiar stakes a writer sets for himself in relation to his community.

Quoting a Polish-born poet who knew Singer, she conveys what the reader might recognize as her own judgment: "He had no desire to co-operate, to create something in a common effort for Jewish culture; he had no interest in that. What was he interested in? Writing. Writing and being translated into English."

Lost Landscapes suggests that while Singer maintained an intimate link with his Polish-Jewish past, through his publications and his devotion to Yiddish, his potential audience severed that link. "At his funeral," one of Tuszynska's interviewees tells her, "they all talked about themselves. And everyone spoke in English. Rabbi Berkowitz. His son. No one spoke Yiddish."

A new stage of recovery of the prewar life of Jewish Poland is taking place. A new museum of Jewish culture is planned for central Warsaw, and the Jewish community of the city is in the process of recovering numerous properties that were Jewish-owned before the war.

In some sections of Polish culture there is a willingness to rethink the meaning of Poland's Jewish past. Tuszynska does not hesitate to describe the ignorance about Jews that is common among Poland's youth, which is often complicated by age-old stereotypes and resentments. But Lost Landscapes represents a counter-tradition in contemporary Polish culture, in which Jewishness must be recovered as a vital aspect of the country's past.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is co-editor of the Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and chairs the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Young actress stars in challenging one-woman play

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Toronto's Jane Milman is already a seasoned actor at 20 years of age.

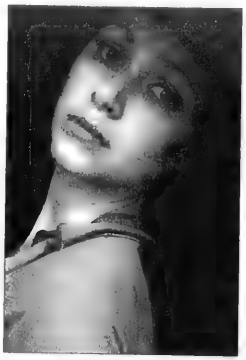
The Russian-born performer has notched up an impressive CV, starring in, among other things, Phoenix productions of A.R. Gurney's Sylvia and the Olga Chevoda play The Devil Of Fantasy, but her latest and most difficult role is one that any actor would find challenging.

In the one-woman play Death Occurred, which Milman co-wrote with her father, Vladimir, she not only plays a woman who dies of cancer, she also portrays the woman's family and friends, looking at how the disease affects an entire community.

"It's been emotional," says Milman of her work on the play to be produced at the York Woods Library theatre Aug. 22 to 28. "I haven't had to face what it would be like to lose a loved one. I have more to learn from this play than anyone else. You really see how… people react to death."

With such a heart-wrenching subject, it's understandable that the young actress has had difficulty playing this role. But as the play's co-writer, she says this production is as much a labour of love as it is a chance to tackle a challenging character.

"It's hard, but I love it so much. When you really love something, it doesn't matter how difficult it is," she says. In this play, "you have a whole bunch of people looking at the same situation in different ways. It's a matter of going back in people's lives and developing their character."



Jane Milman

Attempting to convey the emotions of several different characters is taxing in itself, but Milman says her biggest challenge was getting accustomed to starring in a one-person play.

"This is the most difficult [role I've played]," she says. "It's such a different thing to be on stage alone. We have a lot of friends in the arts, and [one of them] said even really experienced actors don't go for this because it's hard to be on a stage alone for 40 minutes."

However, there are some bright spots to working without a cast.

"It's almost more gratifying to work with this because I don't have to be with anyone else. With ensemble casts, you're frustrated because you want to work your character but someone [else] wants to work theirs. In this case, it's always about working my roles and my characters."

As the play's co-writer on the other hand, she says, collaboration was the key. The fact that her writing partner on Death Occurred was her father presented distinct challenges of its own.

"We both have really strong characters," she says about her dad. "It's just a matter of staying calm when you talk about things, and it's difficult to do that. It's hard to say this is not a family thing, just be open about this."

While the disputes with her co-writer might not be about family, there's no question that her desire to entertain came from her father.

In Russia, Vladimir Milman had a successful career as a poet, but he moved the family to Canada just before the Soviet Union collapsed.

"There were so many people saying it's the Jews' fault, and we all know what happens when a country starts whispering it's the Jews," says Jane, who was five when she moved.

In Canada, Vladimir Milman started translating plays from Russian to English and quickly fell in love with theatre. He soon started writing his own plays. Death Occurred is the first that's made it into production.

Milman and her father started working together five years ago when he asked her to help translate plays, but by then she had already caught the acting bug. Her first stage experience came in Junior High.

JEWISH FOLK CHOIR IS 80 YEARS YOUNG

As it enters its 80th season, the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir is preparing to mark the anniversary with a special program. It has commissioned composer Sid Robinovitch to create a new work for choir and klezmer band, based on the book In Kanade (In Canada) by the late Canadian Yiddish poet Sholem Shtern.

Conducted by Alexander Veprinsky and accompanied by pianist Lina Zemelman, the choir focuses on music with Jewish themes, mostly in Yiddish but also in Hebrew, Russian, Judeo-Spanish and English. Its repertoire also includes classical works on Jewish themes and music of other cultures.

The mixed choir (men and women) welcomes new members. Ability to read music is an asset but not compulsory. Members are encouraged to tape rehearsals and learn their parts at home. Rehearsals begin at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., Wednesday, Sept. 14, 7:30 p.m. Barbara Blaser, 416-398-3405 or tjfolkchoir@sympatico.ca

Names in the News: Former talk-show host Rosie O'Donnell, whom the New York Times recently described as a "brassy Irish-American comedian from Long Island," is slated to step into the role of Golde next month in a production of Fiddler on the Roof at the Minskoff Theater in New York.

O'Donnell will play opposite Harvey Fierstein's Tevye in the 1964 classic of life in the shtetl, based on the popular Tevye the Dairyman stories by Yiddish writer Sholom Aleichem. Producers are hoping her appearance, as of Sept. 20, will boost flagging ticket sales.

The $8-million production opened 19 months ago and is scheduled to close in January unless O'Donnell can turn things around. The original Fiddler, with music by Jerry Bock, lyrics by Sheldon Harnick and a book by Joseph Stein, opened in 1964 and ran for nearly eight years.

Folk-Roots Festival: The Toronto City Roots Song Celebration offers two days of roots music, with free daytime concerts and four stages of live performances in the evenings. Also includes daytime street fair and craft exhibition. Evening programs, $20 in advance, $25 at the door. Distillery District, 55 Mill St. Labour Day weekend, Sept. 2 & 3, 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. 416-364-1177, www.thedistillerydistrict.com

Arts in Brief

• A Celtic Sounds Music Festival unfolds at Black Creek Pioneer Village, Aug. 27 & 28, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. Free with general admission ($11 for adults). Parking $6. 1000 Murray Ross Parkway, south of Steeles Ave., east of Jane St. 416-736-1733, www.blackcreek.ca

• Toronto's historic St. Lawrence neighbourhood along Front Street welcomes clowns, musicians and all kinds of fun as part of the the sixth annual Buskerfest in aid of Epilepsy Toronto, Aug 25 to 28.

• The Shakespeare in the Rough production of The Merchant of Venice continues in Withrow Park (south of Danforth, between Pape and Chester subway stations) until Sept. 5. $15 or PWYC. Call for times. 647-438-6742 or www.shakespeareintherough.ca

• Arta Gallery presents "Women: Wanton, Wild and Wonderful," a group exhibition by Lilli Gillman, Edie Harlang, Leah Landau and Marcia Schnoor. Distillery District, 55 Mill St., Building 9, Suite 102. Artist reception, Aug. 27, 2 to 5 p.m. Show runs until Sept. 8.

• Singer-composer Amy Sky performs at the Living Arts Centre, Mississauga, Saturday, Nov. 12, 8:30 p.m. and comedian Don Rickles appears at the same venue, Thursday, Nov. 17, 8 p.m. www.livingartscentre.ca

• Seneca College offers evening acting classes taught by skilled professionals through its continuing education department on the York University campus. Orientation, Thursday, Sept. 8, 7 p.m. 416-491-5050, ext. 4112.

Actress tackles challenging role

"The Snow Queen [was being put on] in a Russian school, but I wasn't invited because I was really young. I was watching the rehearsals and the lead wasn't learning her lines, so they told me to learn them. I got so into it that I got the part."

Since that fateful day she has starred in several plays and has appeared on TV in Wonderland and 1-800 Missing.

Just as she's starting to get the TV spots, however, Milman is thinking about ditching the acting gig to concentrate more on her psychology degree.

"I don't know what to do," she says, clearly frustrated. "I got an agent a year ago, and if I can keep the acting career up, I will. If I get an audition, I will miss class and go. My first year of University was hard for me because I couldn't act. For the first time in my life this isn't [as big] a part of my life."

Catch Jane Milman in Death Occurred at the York Woods Library Theatre, 1785 Finch Ave. W. (east of Jane Street), Aug. 26, 27, 28, at 7 p.m. Tickets are $10 to $30, students and seniors, $10. Ten per cent of each ticket sold goes to the Canadian Cancer Society. Call 416-395-5473 or 416-395-5512.

Filmmaker Jacobovici offers biblical archeology with a twist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When you think of Simcha Jacobovici's finely wrought documentaries, words like earnest and serious immediately come to mind.

Over the past 15 years, Jacobovici, one of the founders of Associated Producers, has made films running the gamut from Deadly Currents, which dealt with the Arab-Israeli conflict, to The Selling of Innocents, which revolved around child trafficking and prostitution.

But now, in a shift of gears, the award-winning Toronto filmmaker has turned his talents to biblical archeology. He has churned out a 26-part series, The Naked Archaeologist, the first episode of which will be aired on Vision TV on Sept. 5 at 9:30 p.m.

Normally, this is a weighty topic, encumbered by religion, history and politics. But in Jacobovici's hands, it is a subject of some levity.

Expect the unexpected in The Naked Archaeologist.

"It's a very big departure from what I usually do," he said in an interview in a bare, sun-splashed room with a great view of Toronto's garment district and Chinatown.

In a break with the past, he acts as the host of the show. He is also irreverent, funny and, sometimes, a bit over the top. And in a quirky dream sequence that may raise hackles, he submerges himself in the identity of a Jewish rapper.

Jacobovici stretches himself in new and different directions so as to "expose" biblical archeology, one of his passions.

"I want to serve it up naked, stripped of the bullshit," he said in a burst of Jacobovician rhetoric. "I bring a kind of simplicity, an outsider's perspective, the skills of an investigative journalist, to it."

He gravitated to the subject of archeology after making The Quest for the Lost Tribes in 1996, a film that explored an intriguing dimension of Jewish history.

But what really got him going was his perception that archeologists generally treat chunks of the Bible as fiction rather than fact.

JEWS IN MILITARY LIFE IS THEME OF LONDON-AREA MUSEUM

England's Ajex Museum, operated by the Association of Jewish Ex-Servicemen and Women, moved two years ago and reopened recently in Hendon, just in time to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II.

As befits an institution that highlights the Jewish contribution to nearly three centuries of British military history, the museum's cabinets are filled with medals, uniforms, insignia and even weapons. Various panels focus on heroes and heroines who were awarded the Victoria Cross, for example, or served in the Punjab or were rescuers at Belsen.

Among many other canvases, the museum has a portrait of Sir Alexander Schomberg, who served as a frigate commander in the Royal Navy in 1759 when the British stormed the Plains of Abraham to capture Quebec from the French.

One of the exhibit's most extraordinary items is a flag from a German U-boat captured off Rhodes in 1945.

The museum keeps an archive for research purposes. Resources include an index of 60,000 Jewish men and women who served in World War II, as well as an honour roll of those who served in World War I. 020-8202-2323, www.ajex.org.uk

Clandestine Immigration Museum: The David Ha-Cohen Clandestine Immigration and Navy Museum in Haifa highlights the history of Israel's period of secret immigration from 1934 to 1948, when the British imposed strict quotas on Jewish immigration. About 116 vessels smuggled some 122,500 immigrants into British Mandate Palestine during this period, mostly between 1945 and 1948.

Canadians may be interested to know that the museum's centerpiece is a Canadian-built tank carrier that once carried Holocaust survivors to Israel. It was named Af Al Pi Chen, which means "Nevertheless" or "In Spite of It All."

Built in 1941 at the Polson Iron Works in Toronto, the carrier served in North Africa during World War II and was later utilized by an Italian shipping company. Pressed into service to smuggle immigrants in 1947, the ship was intercepted by British destroyers. The vessel was towed to Haifa Bay and the 434 Holocaust survivors on board were interned in Cyprus. Most made it to Israel after 1948.

After a decade-long naval career, the Af Al Pi Chen was cut into sections and moved ashore. It went on display outside the museum in 1968 and is visible from Haifa's famous promenade and other points.

The David Ha-Cohen Clandestine Immigration and Navy Museum is located at 204 Allenby Street, Haifa. Telephone 972-4-853-6249.

Proof the Exodus is not a figment of the imagination

"The received wisdom of academia on biblical archeology is that the earliest parts, from Exodus onward, are mythological stories and fairy tales."

Archeologists who indulge in such practices are falsifying the truth, somewhat like Holocaust deniers who deny that six million Jews were murdered during World War II.

Jacobovici, who became an Orthodox Jew more than a decade ago, stands firmly in the camp of the believers.

"From a historical aspect, I take the Bible as history, unless someone demonstrates it's not. I have no reason to believe the stories in the Bible didn't happen." He paused, asserting, "If you don't think it's true, prove it!"

He argued that some biblical archeologists are motivated by crass politics and a dislike of Jews.

Modern archeology emerged with the rise of fascism, and some archeologists were plainly anti-Semitic, he said.

And in the case of Palestinians seeking to delegitimize Israel's claim to the land, archeology is merely another tool in their arsenal, he added.

Jacobovici, who recently finished filming, shot on location in Israel, Egypt and Greece. In all but one case, local officials did not co-operate.

The Israel Antiquity Authority was useless. "The IAA didn't help. I made the series despite them."

He reckons the IAA ostracized him because it did not appreciate one of his previous documentaries, James: Brother of Jesus.

Nor were the Egyptians co-operative, though they issued the permits he required to poke around archeological sites in the Sinai Peninsula. "Egypt is also trying to control the flow of history."

Only the Greeks co-operated, he said.

Currently, Jacobovici is editing and polishing his next documentary, The Exodus Decoded, which will be broadcast on the Discovery Channel come November and privately screened around the same time.

There is not a single shred of archeological evidence to support the thesis that the events in Exodus occurred, he allowed.

But in his forthcoming 90-minute film, a mix of The Matrix and The Da Vinci Code, he excavates proof that Exodus is not a figment of the imagination.

Withdrawal may determine Sharon's place in history

Ben-Gurion's successor, Levi Eshkol, is remembered for stammering in a key address to a frightened nation days before the outbreak of the Six Day War. For years, the perceived nervousness tarred Eshkol as a weak leader.

Though later research did much to rehabilitate Eshkol, a new book by the historian Tom Segev restores his image as a ditherer and blames him for missing a chance for peace with Jordan's King Hussein that might have sidelined former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and his Palestine Liberation Organization decades ago.

Golda Meir is associated with two failures: the inability to read the signals leading to the 1973 Yom Kippur War and insensitivity toward Israel's Sephardi underclass. Together, these shortcomings generated a process that led to the emergence of Menachem Begin in 1977 as Israel's first prime minister from the right-leaning Likud Party.

Begin is remembered primarily for the land-for-peace deal he struck with then Egyptian President Anwar Sadat soon after coming to power. He also was able to build an abiding alliance between his Likud Party and the Sephardim. And it was Begin who made the decision to bomb Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981, a move that at first was criticized around the world but which, in retrospect, was praised by western officials as far-sighted.

But Begin too had his failures. The 1982 Lebanon War that was meant to crush the PLO turned sour as Israel got sucked into an occupation that lasted 18 years, at a high cost of soldiers' lives and international support.

Begin resigned as prime minister and remained a recluse until his death, in 1992.

His successor, Yitzhak Shamir – who voted against the peace treaty with Egypt – is remembered for his reluctance to take the peace process forward. "The sea is the same sea and the Arabs are the same Arabs" was his dictum.

But when Shamir started a peace process with the 1991 Madrid conference that the Israeli public felt he would never complete, they turned again to the left, bringing Yitzhak Rabin to power.

Rabin, the general who led the Israel Defense Forces to victory in the Six Day War, is remembered for the Oslo peace process that cost him his life. He was the first Israeli leader to negotiate with the PLO, beginning an ambitious project that was meant to bring recognition from the entire Arab world in return for most of the territory captured in the Six Day War and the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Twelve years later, however, many Israelis have come to believe that Rabin was naive in rehabilitating Arafat as a potential peace partner and even arming him, without clear evidence that he had abandoned terrorism.

Many now see Oslo as a carelessly negotiated process that, in retrospect, raises questions about Rabin's reputation for clear strategic thinking – though it's not clear how Rabin would have proceeded had he lived to see the peace process unravel.

Oslo's collapse nearly five years ago brought Sharon to power. His mandate was to crush the armed Palestinian uprising and try a more careful approach to peace that Israelis could live with and Palestinians couldn't abuse.

When the "road map" peace plan was formulated, for example, Sharon insisted that – unlike Oslo – it be performance-based, meaning that the process would not advance from stage to stage if the Palestinians failed to keep their commitments.

But the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and the northern West Bank is the main thrust of Sharon's approach, and how it turns out will to a large extent determine how he's remembered.

Sharon's career so far has had many defining moments: the young officer who created Israel's first elite commando unit, on which much of the Israel Defence Forces' fighting doctrine is modelled; the silver-haired general, his head bandaged, crossing the Suez Canal and turning the tide in the 1973 Yom Kippur War; the hero turned villain who, as defence minister, misled Begin in the Lebanon War and was forced to resign in disgrace after Israel's Lebanese Christian allies massacred Palestinians in refugee camps; and the inveterate builder of settlements.

Up to this point, Sharon's political philosophy has been based on peace through projection of power. The current withdrawal is an attempt to marry power – Israel was tired of waiting for a Palestinian partner and now is setting the agenda unilaterally – to the return of land to spark a future peace process.

If it works, Sharon will go down in history as an Israeli de Gaulle, a right-wing general who rolled back an untenable occupation when the cost in soldiers' lives and international opprobrium became too high. In Sharon's case, he also will be praised for solving Israel's demographic problem by paving the way for a smaller Israel with an undisputed Jewish majority.

If it fails, however, and instead of a new peace process Israel gets more and worse terrorism, Sharon will be seen as a gambler who gave in to domestic and international pressure – and lost.

The stakes for Sharon and his place in history are high.

Pullout foes use guilt on Jewish soldiers

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

NEVEH DEKALIM, Gaza Strip – The soldier with a honey-coloured ponytail tucked under her hat was surrounded by weeping teenage girls asking her where her Jewish heart was – but she didn't flinch.

"How can you evacuate my grandmother? She was in the Palmach," one teary-eyed girl with dark hair and a long red skirt pleaded last week, referring to the elite Jewish militia that fought to establish Israel in 1948.

Liron Ben-Dor, the 19-year-old soldier, replied calmly, "I love this country no less than you do. We are doing this so we can continue living here."

Unconvinced, the growing crowd of girls and young women continued to bombard her with the slogans and arguments that the anti-pullout movement has drilled them to repeat.

One asked her how she could carry out such a crime, referring to the ongoing evacuation of Gaza's Jewish settlements. Another told her she was being used by the Israeli government.

A third asked her, "Why do I have to defend my home from soldiers?"

The scene was replicated countless times last week and in the weeks leading up to the pullout as the anti-withdrawal camp used what it hoped would be its most effective weapon: psychological guilt.

The pullout foes see it differently, saying they were merely spreading the truth – one, they say, given to them by God.

The main slogans of the movement are: "A Jew does not expel another Jew," and "Soldier, policeman, refuse orders."

Another popular chant is "Shame on you," as activists asked soldiers and police officers how they'll live with themselves in the future after having allegedly betrayed the Jewish people.

In most cases, police and soldiers did not engage their questioners and stared directly ahead, their eyes hidden behind reflective sunglasses. Some appeared bored by the repeated verbal abuse and even began to yawn.

But some were stung. One soldier, visibly upset by the verbal warfare, wiped a tear from her eyes during the scuffles last week in Neveh Dekalim. Her friend and fellow soldier gave her a hug.

The troops kept moving forward.

Further down the road, a teenage girl spotted a soldier with a kippah. As he passed by, she yelled, "He's wearing a kippah. How can that be? He should take it off."

Iskar Lugar, 15, from Petach Tikva kneeled in the sand behind a row of soldiers on break sitting on a curb, their backs toward her.

In a voice hoarse from crying, Lugar yelled out at them, "I'm your sister. Why are you doing this? As long as we are connected to the land, we are connected to God."

Israel makes history again at Rogers Cup tennis

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MONTREAL — For the second consecutive year, the Israeli doubles Davis Cup team of Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram made history by their stellar play in Montreal at the recent Rogers Cup tennis tournament at Jarry Tennis Stadium. Erlich and Ram became the first Israeli and all Jewish doubles team to finish as runners-up in the 125-year-old tournament, besting their quarter-final finish in Toronto last year.

Ehrlich's and Ram's achievement ranks as one of the memorable highlights of Israelis competing in tennis in Canada. Harel Levy has been the only Israeli to finish as a runner-up in singles at the 2000 Rogers Cup tournament in Toronto. In Montreal, the best finish by an Israeli in singles came at the 1981 tournament when Shlomo Glickstein finished as a semi-finalist.

Erlich/Ram began the tournament by defeating the South African team of Huss/Moodie 7-6 (2), 2-6, 7-6 (4), fifth seed team of Paes/Zimonjic of India 2-6, 6-3, 7-6 (3), avenged their loss at last year's tournament to Canadian Daniel Nestor and partner Mark Knowles of the Bahamas by defeating them 4-6, 7-6(8), 7-6 (4), and the number two seed USA Davis Cup team of twin brothers Bob and Mike Bryan 7-6 (4), 6-7 (4), 6-4 in the semi-final round before losing in the finals to the fourth seed team of Wayne Black and Kevin Ulyett of Zimbabwe 6-7 (5), 6-3, 6-0.

The duo earned $25,825 (US) for their runner-up finish and moved their doubles rankings upward to 10th in the world. In their three years playing together, Ehrlich/Ram have won six doubles titles and have been runners-up four times.

Erlich/Ram's performance was especially impressive since rain postponed matches and they had to play their three final doubles matches in two days.

"Andy (Ram) and I are very pleased, given the circumstances. It is not often that we can beat the number two, three and five seeds all at the same tournament," said Erlich.

Unlike singles play, doubles competition involve co-ordination of players in net play, speed, power and concentration. "It is so important that we play with an understanding of what we can do against our opponents. Jonathan and I know each other for many years, since we were juniors. I never had any success until I started playing with him in 2003," said Ram.

Remarkably, the duo played the maximum three sets in all of their matches and, with the exception of the semis and final matches, rallied for victories in the third set tiebreaker due to inspired net play and a belief that they would break their opponents.

"We knew it was only a matter of time before we would break our opponents. In the match against Knowles and Nestor, we read their serves well and knew we could beat them if we pushed them far enough with volleys and backhands. Our strategy worked and the good level of play gives us confidence in our play," said Erlich.

In their quarter-final match, Erlich/Ram were also battling a hometown crowd that was rooting for Nestor and Knowles. Nestor/Knowles at one point in the second set relinquished two match points and never recovered.

Erlich, 28, and Ram, 25, have been a formidable duo since teaming up two years ago. They have won three doubles titles together and finished as semi-finalists at Wimbledon in 2003. Andy Ram also finished as a mixed doubles finalist in 2003, losing to tennis legend Martina Navratilova and Leander Paes.

Both players immigrated to Israel as children from Argentina (Erlich) and Uruguay (Ram) and share a love of Israel. Erlich and Ram were proud to represent Israel in the 2004 Olympics and were disappointed not to finish in the medal round.

"It means so much to our people back home to do well. We feel that when we perform well, it reflects well on Israel," said Ram.

One of their opponents believes that with their runner-up finish in Montreal, it is not far-fetched for them to win a Grand Slam tournament.

"We saw how tough they (Erlich/Ram) were in our match," said Nestor. "They are so difficult because they never give you free points based on mistakes. As a result, you can never let up against them. They have been playing together for longer than most of the doubles teams."

Two Jewish players (Noam Okun of Israel and Glenn Weiner of the United States), entered the singles tournament through the qualifying rounds. Only Okun survived to the main draw and lost in the opening round to Germany's Karol Beck 6-2, 6-2.

Former Winnipegger builds career as golf pro in Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Israel won a gold medal in men's golf at the 17th Maccabiah Games last month thanks to the efforts of Andy Nemiroff, a 33-year-old former Winnipegger who is Israel's only professional golfer.

Nemiroff won the medal with a record score of 13 under par over four rounds. The match was held in Caesarea, home to one of only two courses in Israel.

"This was my first Maccabiah Games," said Nemiroff, who was back in Winnipeg visiting family. "It was a special two weeks. This year's games attracted the largest number of athletes and the largest number of spectators in the history of the games. It was also the strongest field ever in all the sports."

Nemiroff took up golfing when he was six. By the time he finished high school, he knew he wanted to try the professional ranks.

"My parents were always very supportive," he said.

As a junior, he played in competitions throughout North America. Ten years ago, he turned pro.

It was love that first brought Nemiroff to Israel. While on vacation in Mexico, he met Sharon, an Israeli girl who was also on holiday. He visited Sharon in Israel and fell in love with the country.

"I went back and forth a few times before deciding to make aliyah," he said. "I have no regrets. It was the best decision I have ever made."

He made aliyah five years ago. He and Sharon were married in 2003.

So what does a professional golfer do for a living in Israel? After all, the country is not exactly a hot bed of golfing.

Nemiroff lucked out. He was hired by Kibbutz Ga'ash (near Netanya) to be the pro at the kibbutz's golf course.

"I was teaching Israelis to play golf," he said. "Most of my students had never played before. It was a lot of fun and really interesting. You wouldn't think Israelis would have the patience for golf. Yet the sport is becoming more and more popular."

Eighteen months ago, after acquiring several sponsors, Nemiroff was able to resume his career as a professional golfer. He has competed in tournaments in Spain, Greece and Turkey and is entered in the European tour qualifying tournament in Cologne, Germany, next month.

The European Tour is every bit as competitive as the North American tours and some of the world's top golfers play the European circuit, he said.

Despite being a full-time player now, Nemiroff still makes time to hold clinics in Israel for adults and children.

He generally comes back home to Winnipeg in the summers to see his family and compete in local or Canadian events. He missed qualifying for the Telus Open in Edmonton and the MTS Classic in Winnipeg this summer by one shot each.

Nemiroff pointed out he is just entering his prime years as a professional golfer. "Usually golfers are at their peak from their early 30s to mid 40s," he said.

The sound of music

I've just joined the MP3 phenomenon, and let me tell you, it's wonderful. Musical technology has come a long way since cassette tapes.

I remember saving money from my minimum wage after-school job to buy a Sony Walkman. It was bright yellow and waterproof – and it was the coolest mechanical device I ever owned.

A decade later, my Walkman was replaced by a Discman. Some friends chipped in and got me the new toy for my birthday. Unfortunately, I didn't own a single CD at the time. It seems I am always slightly behind when it comes to new technology. I still use a VCR and a small 12-inch television from the early '90s.

I was upset when cassette tapes finally became obsolete – I had such a great collection. Before that, I had a bunch of shiny black records that I played on my parents' record player. Paul McCartney, Duran Duran and Michael Jackson filled the silence on the rare occasions I was alone in the house. I even had a collection of 45s, the ones that needed little yellow plastic things in the centre in order to play them.

But none of these devices come close to my brand new silver iPod. I love it.

After I had hinted for months that I "needed" one, my boyfriend surprised me with it. Then a friend loaded it up with songs he had downloaded for himself. (I must figure out how to use this technology.)

On Day 1, I had the little white earphones in my ears for hours. On the subway, I became one of dozens of people dancing in my seat ever so slightly. I never realized how many people own iPods. It's astounding where music takes you. I couldn't stop smiling. I went to another world. I created a documentary in my head to an inspiring song.

I didn't want to go back home to do work, so I went to the supermarket and skipped down the cereal aisle. I hummed along to '80s tunes in the canned food section. I became briefly emotional listening to a Spanish lullaby in the vegetable aisle and locked eyes with a woman listening to a blue iPod. She gave me a look of approval upon seeing mine. After that, I noticed many more iPod-listening people smiling my way: in the elevator of my building, at the gym, at a coffee shop. We grinned at each other like old friends. We were iPod-bonding.

I later learned iPod's are not just for music. My friend recently downloaded the Torah for his father to listen to. Jewish classes and Torah lectures are also widely available. Another friend orders two audio books a month and listens to them on her way to work. You can download radio shows from around the world in different languages. There are recordings of many famous political speeches, including those of Martin Luther King Jr. and John F. Kennedy. You can create your own mixes and stream your own broadcasts.

Unsigned artists can use the format to distribute their music. "Podcasting" is a method of publishing audio broadcasts via the Internet that allows users to subscribe to a feed of new files.

Another friend made his own playlist for a huge outdoor party. He explained: "I created two, 40-song playlists so the music would fit the mood. I plugged my iPod into my stereo speaker system and just let it play." Wow.

He continued: "Everything becomes more cinematic listening to songs when doing errands. [The] music [lets] you experience things in a much more visceral way. You have a soundtrack going on, so riding the subway is like being in a film. It colours the way you see things. You connect to things differently. It's a diverse sort of engagement."

I couldn't agree more. My only advice to offer regarding this MP3 trend is download and use responsibly. And as soon as I figure out how to download my own songs, I'll let you know.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

René Cassin (1887-1976), a leading world figure in the struggle for recognition of the rights of the individual, was largely responsible for the drafting of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights.

A native of Bayonne, France, Cassin was the son of a Jewish merchant. He was a brilliant student at the Lycée of Nice and at the University of Aix-en-Province where he took degrees in humanities and law. In a competitive examination given by the law faculty, he placed first. And in 1914, he received a doctorate in juridicial, economic and political sciences.

He began a legal career – interrupted by World War I in which he was gravely wounded and decorated with both the Croix de Guerre and the Médaille Militaire for bravery – and then began to teach law. He served the French government-in-exile during World War II (apparently he was the first civilian to leave Bordeaux in response to Gen. Charles de Gaulle's broadcast to the French people from London) and, after the conflict, held high positions in both France and Europe.

René Cassin

From 1965 to 1968, he was president of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. He served on the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in various senior roles from 1946 to 1957, and was credited with being the most important contributor to the wording of the UN Declaration of Human Rights.

In an article written to help mark the International Year of Human Rights in 1968, Cassin concluded: "Now that we possess an instrument capable of lifting or easing the burden of oppression and injustice in the world, we must learn to use it." (One cannot help but wonder how René Cassin would react to the activities of the UN Human Rights Commission in the 21st century with a majority of its members among the foremost violators of human rights on the globe.)

Excerpted from The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World.

Frozen Jews?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

We are afraid of the increase in anti-Semitism yet most of do little to stymie it. Are we frozen Jews?

Why have our community leaders centralized the job of fighting anti-Semites and in the process excluded most of our members from helping ourselves? Why is there no communal plan to teach us to become soldiers for peace and our own line of defence, rather than leaving the job of strengthening us in the hands of a few. Frozen Jews?

Fellow Jews, it is time we recognized our ability to change our plight; to take a stand on our own behalf rather than watching, waiting and hoping for others to scrap on our behalf.

Where is the Jewish equivalent of a non-Jewish committee recently created by Tony Comper, CEO of the Bank of Montreal, and his wife Elizabeth, to battle anti-Semitism? Why are we watching our own destiny from the sidelines and indifferently allowing others to do the work? Where is the front-line initiative and creativity of more of our Jewish businessmen and women? Frozen Jews?

Why do we regularly invite Eli Wiesel and other voices of valour to speak at our organizational launches, dinners and events? Their message is generally the same – we as Jews cannot be indifferent to injustice, especially our own. Why are we not responding to Wiesel's call to arms when he says, "Indifference is not a beginning, it is an end. And, therefore, indifference is always the friend of the enemy, for it benefits the aggressor – never his victim, whose pain is magnified when he or she feels forgotten. The political prisoner in his cell, the hungry children, the homeless refugees – not to respond to their plight, not to relieve their solitude by offering them a spark of hope is to exile them from human memory. And in denying their humanity we betray our own."

Anti-Semitism is growing around the world. Why are we simply complaining? Frozen Jews?

Here are some ideas. Please consider them whether you are a stockbroker, housewife, cantor, student, teacher, mechanic, doctor, actor, computer techie or truck driver. Start a group among your friends and/or colleagues just as Tony and Elizabeth Comper did and offer your services to B'nai Brith or Canadian Jewish Congress to guard our cemeteries and institutions. Expand your group's agenda to enhance friendships with non-Jews who are intrigued by the Jewish people and influence those sitting on the fence, who might just appreciate the beauty of partnership and comradeship.

Let's insist that every participant on March of the Living and birthright speak on their return to schools, churches and any audience that will listen to their stories of the virtues of the Jewish people and Israel. This is not apologetic. It is called making friends. Ultimately, it marginalizes evil, giving it little room to operate within.

Rabbis, why do you stand before us on Shabbat and the High Holy Days speaking painfully about the Jew beaten in France and the Jewish man terrorized in Markham by a hateful person, yet rarely call upon your congregants to become activists?

Community leaders, let go of the reins you hold so tightly and empower us to stand tall like the biblical Jacob, who fearing an attack strategically, with foresight, separated his camps when he learned his malevolent brother Esau was coming to meet him. Community leaders, divide up our camps cleverly, show us how to find peace and means of seeing and countering destructive forces. Show us how to help our Jewish brothers and sisters suffering from anti-Semitism around the world.

No more indifference! In 2005, knowing what we know, having what we have, leaves no room for frozen Jews. Please.

The Oxford English Dictionary defines "community" as "an organized political, municipal or social body" and, alternately, as "a body of people having religion, profession, etc. in common."

Indeed, in the Jewish community of the Greater Toronto Area, there are certain characteristics that bind us inexorably together.

Some of those qualities are: a pull toward Israel; a sense of being a family; certain rites and traditions, such as brit milah and Yom Kippur; even the game of "Jewish geography" that seems to come up whenever two Jews get together.

Yet, the term community can be extremely misleading, because it implies that a group is largely homogenous.

Feature

When it comes to the Jewish community, that's definitely not the case. We have Ashkenazim and Sephardim; people who keep kosher and people who don't; those who believe in day schools and those who don't; people who believe passionately in "Greater Israel," and those who believe just as passionately in the need for a Palestinian state. The list is almost as long as the number of Jews who live here.

But one thing most people in the Toronto Jewish community do have in common is that either they or their ancestors came here from somewhere else, often from a small, close-knit community made up largely of Jews.

In eastern Europe, that place was called a shtetl, and the development of the Toronto Jewish community – even to this day as the community continues to move northward along Bathurst Street – can be seen as the re-creation of a shtetl-like atmosphere.

In eastern Europe, and especially the Pale of Settlement, a shtetl was a small place where Jews lived – a relatively self-contained village with stores, a shul (or several), a school and a butcher shop. It also had the people who made life work – the rabbi, the melamed (teacher), the shochet, the tailor and the matchmaker. It even usually boasted one or more outsiders, such as the luftmensch, (the kindest definition of which is someone with no visible means of support), the freethinker and the beggar.

After just three months, I must leave my new love

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

As my time in Canada slowly draws to a close, I find myself in love.

My summer romance has not only been hot, it's been scorching.

And although I have felt completely at home here, I've also felt excited, amazed, and, most of the time, breathless – breathless at the absolute freedom and independence it has afforded me and breathless at the sheer beauty I see in it every day.

Canada is my beau, and its people and culture are friends that I have come to know well.

In May, I stepped onto a flight from Johannesburg, South Africa, literally flying out of my comfort zone and into unknown territory.

I left a job I am passionate about, as well as friends and family to whom I am very close.

I am a journalist, and journalists are by nature inquisitive about the world around them.

For the chance to focus on my writing, live in a different country, meet new people and experience a Jewish community that is much larger and far more diverse than the one I grew up in, I accepted a summer internship at The Canadian Jewish News as the paper's first international intern.

In my quest to become a part of Toronto, I have had to adapt to a new culture and mindset, constantly reminding myself to lift my jaw off the sidewalk and stop being shocked at how safe it is to walk in the streets, or return videos in the early hours of the morning, or go grocery shopping at midnight or later.

It's also been revealing to see how kind this city is to its young adults and children, who can ride buses and subways, and play in gardens that are not surrounded by high walls and electric fences.

These things are integral to Canadian life, but they're so foreign to me.

When asked, I tell people that South Africa is a country in the middle of a major transformation, one that allows for personal growth, opportunity and creativity.

I am living in, and am a part of, history: the journey from apartheid to democracy. I'm old enough to remember some of the evils of my country's past, yet young enough to appreciate the changes occurring in the present.

Those who emigrated feel they traded South Africa's high standard of living for a quality of life in which freedom and safety are non-negotiable.

Many left in the 1970s and '80s, before the end of apartheid was in sight. They could not have imagined the relatively peaceful revolution that we've been undergoing. Others who left later, after the end of legally enforced race-based segregation, could no longer stand the constant threat of crime that we face. For all, the desire for a better life was their motivation.

Lara Greenberg

Young adults and children in South Africa face stresses far beyond those of others their age, with safety and AIDS topping the list of concerns. But for many, there is a desire to be a part of the positive changes taking place there.

There's an energy and buzz in South Africa, with artists selling their wares on virtually every street corner, new businesses starting up all the time and social development projects always on the go.

We're building a nation.

With all the activities available to me in Canada – festivals, parades, random wandering, the beach, Harbourfront, the theatre, excursions to museums and art galleries, etc. – somehow that same joie de vivre doesn't exist here.

Yet, Canadians have the advantage of living in a place where things usually happen as they should.

Indeed, there's a sense of structure that runs deep in the culture and minds of Canadians. I see it all over, even at the bus station, where people wait in straight lines.

That never happens in South Africa. We are still learning to make things work.

In its 11th year after the end of apartheid, my country is but a child in the democratic world, and as a people, we don't stand in straight lines or follow desired patterns.

Our challenge and strength is in dealing with the unexpected.

The crime rate is high, and killing or raping to get what they want doesn't seem to bother the criminals.

We protect our homes, our cars and our streets. To avoid trouble, we merely yield at red lights and stop signs at night, and we always keep our cellphones charged and have enough money on hand in case of an emergency.

Despite the fear, we carry on with our lives and enjoy the natural beauty of our country. That is our defiance.

We also have beautiful weather, with summer and winter flowing into one another without much fuss or fanfare.

After experiencing a hot Canadian summer, I can't even begin to imagine winter.

I need to come back to see how the seasons change the face of this country, including the attitudes of its people, who get the chance to live in two very different worlds within a 12-month period.

But more than anything else, during my time in Canada, I've learned that, with all their differences, people are basically the same everywhere, and that every country has its own challenges and virtues.

I've also learned that home is any place that you are happy and comfortable.

As I prepare to return to South Africa, I now feel like I have two homes – the one I grew up in, and another that in only three short months has become mine.

And so, from across the ocean, the love affair will continue.

From Kensington to Bathurst

If this sounds like something out of the classic musical Fiddler on the Roof, it is. The fictional village Anatevka is what we imagine when we think of a shtetl, and it's a place people remember with nostalgia and a warm feeling.

Yet, poverty and persecution in the shtetl were among the main reasons people left to come to America. (Who knew the difference between the United States and Canada?)

The first Jews in Toronto came from England and the United States in the middle of the 19th century. They settled along King Street, mainly east of Yonge Street and south of Bloor Street. When eastern European Jews began in arriving at the end of the 19th century, they settled north of Queen Street between Yonge and University Avenue in an area known as the Ward, largely in row housing close to their work in the area. When things became better for them financially, they began to move to what we tend to think of today as the shtetl of Toronto – Kensington Market.

Stephen Speisman, founding director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and author of The Jews of Toronto; a history to 1937, (and, as it happens, my husband), led this reporter on a voyage of discovery to find out what happened to the old Toronto shtetl.

As we walked and drove through the Kensington Market area and then north along Bathurst Street, he explained that people moved to the market area in the decade before World War I because the housing there was better and larger, with brick fronts, lawns and indoor plumbing – all luxuries compared to the cramped conditions of the Ward.

While wealthier Jews lived on streets such as Beverley Street, most in the Kensington-Spadina community were "generally lower and lower middle class," Speisman explained – "labourers, pedlars, storekeepers, people who operated small businesses from their home."

The area certainly fit the description of a shtetl. There were shuls, schools, landsmanshaften (mutual benefit societies), political societies, labour organizations, athletic clubs, amateur and professional theatres, and retail shops.

Whatever you wanted could be found there, from butchers, hardware stores, grocers and egg stores to ice cream shops and restaurants.

But while Jewish immigrants wanted to create a European-style shtetl in their new land, a place where they would feel secure, in fact it was different in one major way: shtetls were, by and large, homogeneous, but in Toronto, as in the rest of the New World, the Jewish community included people from all parts of Europe.

Kensington Market-Spadina was the heart of the Jewish community until the 1950s, when people again felt the urge to live in "nicer" areas with lots of green space.

Viable communities, Speisman explained, tend to move into contiguous areas. (This is not only true of Jewish communities. The Italian community, for instance, first settled in the Dufferin and Keele street areas around College Street, and Italians moved north up Dufferin and Keele and many eventually settled in Woodbridge.)

Chabad LED sign in Vaughan

Jews also moved into contiguous areas, but by and large, they didn't move directly up Spadina Avenue, mainly because it ran through expensive neighbourhoods such as Forest Hill, but also because some of those areas still had "restrictive covenants" that unofficially barred Jews from living there. Instead of moving up Spadina, they moved north into newer neighbourhoods along the more affordable – and socially accessible – Bathurst Street.

So, although there were pockets of Jews in, for instance, areas such as Bracondale near Bathurst and St. Clair Avenue, the first significant postwar area of settlement was around Bathurst and Eglinton Avenue. It never became like Kensington – there were no corner stores, only a few shuls (Beth Tzedec and Holy Blossom, both of which had moved north from the older neighbourhoods), and there was no sense that your whole life could be contained in a few streets.

Today, we can find several stretches along Bathurst north of Glencairn Avenue that fit the definition of a shtetl.

(This is also not to imply that the northeast part of the old City of North York, between Bayview Avenue and Leslie Street, is not really a Jewish community. Of course it is, as are the pockets of Jews that one finds nearly everywhere in the city. But, by and large, the needs of the Jewish community are met along Bathurst.)

Tanenbaum's vision comes to reality

As you travel north along Bathurst from Glencairn to Wilson Avenue, for instance, you will have no doubt that you are in a Jewish area. Every few feet, you find yeshivas, storefront shuls – such as Zichron Shneur, the Gerer shtiebl and the "Boat Shul" – kosher butchers and grocers, bakeries, landsmanshaften, monument makers, bookstores, restaurants and bookstores. You will also find retirement and senior citizens homes, and the world famous Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

While the Orthodox population is well-represented here, not just in businesses but in the people we passed on the street, the Arbeiter Ring (also called the Workmen's Circle) and the Morris Winchevsky Centre, both of which are religiously and politically left-wing, show that Jewish independence of thought is alive and well in this part of our little shtetl.

The relatively large green spaces between Wilson and Finch Avenue may be one of the reasons that this stretch of Bathurst never became as shtetl-ish as others. Yet, Earl Bales Park, which we entered through a street named after the quintessential righteous gentile Raoul Wallenberg, is home to a stark and brooding Holocaust memorial, as it soon will be to a new monument to Jewish war veterans.

The park, a favourite with Jewish seniors, also hosts community marches, memorials, picnics, marathons and concerts. It is also a gathering place for card players, kibbitzers, dog walkers and people-watchers.

Kiever Shul

Earl Bales Park and the West Don River Valley force the shtetl to jog northwest of Bathurst and Sheppard Avenue into Bathurst Manor, where shuls, schools, retirement homes and large house lots are part of that neighbourhood's appeal.

The Lipa Green Building, located in the valley adjacent to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, is the current hub of the organized Jewish community, housing, among others, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, the Ontario Jewish Archives, JIAS, Board of Jewish Education, Jewish Family & Child Service and the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR).

The new Russian community is concentrated mainly between Finch and Steeles Avenue. There you can find Russian stores selling Russian goods and featuring Russian-language ads. The Jewish Russian Community Centre is located in the area as well, offering a shul and meeting place, a newspaper and classes.

Years ago, Bathurst Lawn Cemetery just south of Steeles was so far out in the country that the drive there felt like an epic journey. Now, it's virtually in the centre of Jewish settlement. Roselawn Cemetery, just north of Eglinton, once held the same distinction, but it's now so surrounded by houses and apartments, not to mention being so far south compared to the rest of the community, that many don't even know it is there.

In the early 1980s, the late developer and philanthropist Joseph Tanenbaum started to bring to reality his vision of a Jewish community – a shtetl – centred around a shul and complete with schools, shopping and homes.

In an interview with The CJN in the early 1990s, he said that when he began to gather land in southern York Region, "everyone laughed at me. No one is laughing now."

The Spring Farm development, which is indeed centred around Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation (BAYT) – named for Tanenbaum and his father – and the Spring Farm Plaza, have proved his vision right.

And a shtetl it is. Restaurants, stores, schools, shuls, kosher products in non-kosher stores, including Asian stores that sell greenery to decorate sukkot, and pomegranates to welcome Rosh Hashanah. Local firefighters come to help burn chametz before Pesach, and a bewildered sheriff has given several families permission to cut down bulrushes on city land to use on their sukkot.

AT ASSOCIATED, WE'RE BUILDING JEWISH GENERATIONS.

Knowledge. Values. Inspiration.

These are the cornerstones of Associated's foundation of excellence in education. Our students have a thirst for knowledge. We believe that building a Jewish future is about living Torah values - Jewish unity, community responsibility, love of Israel and menschlichkeit - not just teaching them. Here we inspire each child to reach beyond his or her expectations and flourish as accomplished students, Jewish community members and Canadian citizens.

Community moves north

There is one significant difference between this and a traditional shtetl, where different groups – such as Chassidim and Mitnagdim – didn't really mix, either socially or religiously. Perhaps because Thornhill is a pioneering community, there is a tremendous sense of camaraderie between its members. Most – Sephardi and Ashkenazi, Lubavitch and other Orthodox, observant and non-observant – see themselves as a unit, attending each other's programs and services, carpooling, cooking dinners for new mothers, chatting at the supermarket.

A word must be said here about Lubavitch. When Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the late Lubavitcher rebbe, told his followers to spread Yiddishkeit to undeveloped areas, they took up the call energetically. Not only are Lubavitchers part of existing communities, but they are in the forefront of new ones, often appearing before many of the houses do. Their facilities do not serve only Lubavitchers, or even only Orthodox people. They reach out to all people in the community.

Their shuls, schools and community centres cover Bathurst from Edinburgh Drive just north of Wilson, through northern Toronto and Thornhill, to the newest outposts in Aurora and south of St. Clair.

The organized Jewish community has recognized the northern push of the shtetl and has begun work on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Richmond Hill. It will include communal offices, the northern branch of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, seniors housing, athletic facilities and medical services.

Even farther north, development has started on a new 200-acre cemetery, Pardes Chaim, under the auspices of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park.

Fiddler on the Roof ends with the heartbreaking Anatevka, a song describing what a miserable place the shtetl was, as well as how precious many of the memories of it would be and how much its inhabitants would miss it.

In Toronto, immigrants tried to recreate the good parts of the European shtetl, and even though they couldn't do it completely, it's significant that they tried.

Immigrants often unprepared for new challenges

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Special to The CJN

Toronto is a haven for Jewish immigrants.

The numbers speak for themselves. Approximately 20,000 Jews have immigrated to the Greater Toronto Area since 1990. Nearly 180,000 Jews live in the Greater Toronto Area. More than one-third of them are foreign-born.

Immigrants come from all over looking for a better life, but are often unprepared for the challenges awaiting them.

Many organizations exist to help them when they get here. And perhaps none is more crucial than the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto. JIAS exists to provide contacts and information and helps newcomers find jobs.

The Kisel Family

According to Janis Roth, executive director of JIAS Toronto, the biggest hurdle for immigrants is "getting a good, meaningful job."

The other concern is integration. "[Newcomers] want to become part of the community. They want to know about education for their children, about Jewish neighbourhoods. They want to be part of things quickly," Roth says.

JIAS wants the community to be more proactive in assisting newcomers, she says. "The community has risen to the occasion when it has been asked to. But we're trying to work with the community to always be ready."

The Teitelbaun Family at JIAS office in Toronto

A new JIAS programs, Jumpstart, will pair newcomers with businesses willing to provide them with experience in the local labour market.

Rabbi Yisroel Landa, executive director of the Chabad Israeli Community Centre, works closely with Toronto's Israeli population. One of the biggest challenges in his community involves religious practice.

"[In] Israel, where there's no separation between religion and state, Jewish education is part of the public system. All of a sudden when they get here, to get a Jewish education they need a lot of money. This is very difficult. Some take it as a letdown," he says.

And even when they get into Jewish schools, it's sometimes hard for children to adjust to their new surroundings.

Sivan Tamir, 29, came to Toronto from Israel with her family in 1987 when she was 11. She still remembers the hardships of her first school experience.

"Kids treated me badly, made fun of us because we were Israeli and we didn't understand [Canada]," she recalls. "[Toronto culture] was definitely colder.

"It took me a long time to make friends at school. Kids who had their own circle of friends did not open to new people. That was very hard. Even harder when you didn't know the language."

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, founder of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto, has heard newcomers express similar frustrations. "[Newcomers] don't expect much. They don't expect someone waiting at the airport with a red carpet," he says. "But sometimes [the reception] could be warmer."

He says immigrants are initially puzzled by the cultural differences they encounter. "Their neighbour asks how are you? The newcomer proceeds to answer him in depth, thinking it's the polite thing to do. The next time the neighbour asks him the question, before he responds he is stopped. [The neighbour] explains they don't want their whole story.

JIAS teens walk with Israel

"The [newcomer] walks away thinking, Am I a fool? That guy asked me a question, but doesn't want to hear my answer? Why did he ask? So it feels cold… a different culture."

For others the transition is less jarring. Graciela Tetelbaun, a 39-year-old graphic designer, moved her family to Toronto, via Winnipeg, from Argentina in 2004. Despite the cultural, and climate, change, she still felt welcomed by the community. "The weather… absolutely yes, it's colder," she says with a laugh.

"But not the people. It's a different culture with different habits, but they are not cold people. Actually, I feel that people here are more open than they are in Argentina. When someone new comes to Argentina, nobody cares. Here they worry about you, they try to help. I think the people here are so beautiful." It's a sentiment that underlies the experiences of many immigrants, regardless of initial hardships.

Lia Kisel, 36, works in in-take at JIAS Toronto. Kisel emigrated from Mexico with her family in 2003 and credits JIAS with the success she's had making the transition to living in Toronto. She reminds newcomers that Toronto can be accommodating; you just have to figure out how it works.

"In Mexico, you didn't need to make appointments – you didn't need to call someone before going to their house, you just go and you visit. Here you have to call and set a date in advance," she says.

"But you know what? Once you [get to] know your neighbours, they're as warm as Mexicans."

Immigrant finds Toronto Jews cold and unfriendly

By YOSEF BEN-ELIAHU
Special to The CJN

Comment

It has been 28 years since my father immigrated to Canada from Israel, where he was born. He came to Canada with such high hopes, and yet now, after nearly three decades of living in Toronto, he wants to move back to Israel. The reason, he says, is that he feels alone and isolated from Canadian society at large, and from Toronto's Jewish community in particular.

Shortly after arriving in Toronto, he found that life in his new home was different than he thought it would be. He married my mother at Temple Sinai, a Reform synagogue that my mother's family had belonged to since its founding. My father was uncomfortable with the Reform Jewish traditions of Temple Sinai. Though not religious, he and his family were used to attending Orthodox synagogues in Israel, in which the men and women sat separately, the rabbis were all male, and the service was conducted entirely in Hebrew.

My father did make a concerted effort to fit in to Canadian society, but at the expense of his Israeli roots. When I was a young child, he refused to speak to me in Hebrew. "He didn't want to be different," my mother said. As a result, I had to take the initiative to learn Hebrew on my own. I found out later that I was not the only one to be deprived of my Israeli heritage. In a Hebrew class I attended at the University of Toronto were three students, who unlike myself, were born in Israel, but who were not taught Hebrew by their parents upon moving to Canada at a young age.

In spite of my father's efforts to fit into the community, he felt increasingly isolated. He has found it hard to forge friendships with other Jews and has repeatedly complained that Toronto Jews are cold and unfriendly. In Israel, he said, it was much easier to get along with people and socialize. Israel, my father claims, is a country where friends and neighbours often drop in to your home unannounced, whereas in Canada people have to plan social engagements weeks in advance. In a way, I think my father has a point. I, myself, have found it much easier to socialize in Israel, where people seem to be warmer and more open.

Feeling ever more isolated from fellow Jews, my father has often sought the company of non-Jews, most notably members of the Italian community, perhaps because he feels that the Italians, as a Mediterranean people, are similar to Israelis in their mentality. Over the years, he has grown more attached to the Italian community and has moved further away from Toronto Jewry. A few years ago, he even considered moving to Italy. Now, however, his mind is set on moving back to Israel to be reunited with his sister and the rest of the family that he left behind when he immigrated to Canada.

My father's story should certainly not be taken as the norm amongst Jews who immigrate to Toronto. There are many Jews who have come to the city from abroad and have successfully integrated into Jewish communal life. This includes many Israelis who now call Toronto home.

Unfortunately, however, there are also many cases of Jewish immigrants who do not feel they have a place in Toronto's Jewish community and who may even consider moving away. Hence, it is clear that Toronto Jewry still has to make concerted efforts to ensure that Jewish immigrants feel that they belong and that they should actively participate in the life of their community.

Israelis have difficulty integrating into Canadian society

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

While there are many Jewish communities in Canada that come from different corners of the world, one group has always had more difficulty integrating into Canada's multicultural society.

Even though the Israeli population in Canada continues to climb, some Jews feel that when Israelis move to Canada, it is a step backward for the Zionist goal of having every Jew live in the State of Israel.

Zionism aside, the reality is that more and more Israelis are moving to Canada, mostly to Toronto and Montreal, and they are slowly establishing themselves as a community after so many years, said Rabbi Yisroel Landa.

Rabbi Landa, who came to Toronto as an emissary of Lubavitch-Chabad, is the director of the Beth Chabad Israeli Community and leads an Israeli minyan every Saturday at the Lubavitch shul at Chabad Gate in Thornhill.

He said that his 15 years of living in Toronto among the Israeli community has taught him that they are not well integrated into the larger Jewish community for several reasons.

"There is no established community for the Hebrew-speaking Jews, even after so many years here. They are not integrating easily and fast enough into the local community," Rabbi Landa said.

He said that although efforts are being made by organizations, such as the UJA Federation, to change this perception, many Israelis feel like they are not accepted into the Jewish community.

"With the general establishment of the local community, the Israelis felt for many years that they are being treated badly," he said.

"They feel the establishment thinks negatively about them because they ask, 'Why are you coming here? We sent money to support a State of Israel. Stay there.' And the Israelis always felt that they did their part. They say, 'Let us establish ourselves here and you go there to serve.' This is why Israelis feel so unaccepted here."

Don't feel respected

Rina Cohen, a sociology professor at York University and an Israeli herself, has done extensive research about the Israeli community in Canada to get a better understanding about why they immigrated, and how they fit in to the host society.

In accordance with a study Cohen conducted about Israeli Jews in Canada called The New Immigrants: A Contemporary File, she said that immigration is especially difficult for Israelis because there is a collective struggle to bring people to Israel, so they feel like traitors for leaving.

"They come from a young nation that has struggled to be a Jewish state. It is the antithesis to the Diaspora. To settle outside of Israel is negatively stigmatized. It is discouraging for Canadian Jews to see good Israelis leaving Israel."

She added that Israelis come to Canada for the same reasons that other immigrants do – because of the better standard of living and more opportunities.

"Some Israelis immigrate because they are looking for a change," said Rabbi Landa, who is here on a mission to help the Hebrew-speaking community integrate into the local Jewish community and help them in whatever ways they need.

"It is painful to say, but some are coming because of the situation in Israel. As parents, they think they want to give them [their children] a different environment for the future."

Cohen also noted that immigration usually increases during periods of political turmoil and recession.

"The poor economy and the two intifadahs are pushing factors," she said.

She said she estimates there are 40,000 Israelis in all of Canada, but the number varies from source to source. The number ranges from 20,000 to 60,000.

Rabbi Landa said it is hard to count how many Israelis live in Canada because the new immigrants tend to be unaffiliated.

"They poll the UJA, shuls, [the Jewish Community Centre], but how do you count Israelis that are unaffiliated? The fact that we don't know how many Israelis there are is a big problem."

Cohen thinks that the difficulty is in defining what it is to be Israeli.

"Some people make aliyah, live in Israel for three years, come back home, but call themselves Israeli. What about Russian Jews? Many Russians come to Canada via Israel and live there for 10 years. The younger generation will define themselves as Israeli, while their parents will call themselves Russian," she said.

Maintaining culture important to Israeli immigrants

Rabbi Landa said Israelis continue to migrate to Canada because there is already somewhat of an established Israeli community and there is strength in numbers. It is comforting, he added, to know that they are not the only ones.

More than half of the Israelis in Canada live in the Greater Toronto Area. Israelis tend to go to the big cities, said Cohen, because most of the immigrants come from urban areas and hope to succeed in the same environment. Most have a good command of the English language and a large number of them are university graduates.

"Israelis tend to become businessmen, accountants, dentists and doctors. There are a lot of teachers, music teachers, specialists, engineers and psychologists."

Although the Israeli Jewish community is different from the Canadian Jewish community, it is also important to note that there are distinctions even within the Israeli community itself.

Cohen described the very different mentalities of the first- and second-generation immigrants.

"First-generation immigrants tend to create their own enclave and are less likely to be affiliated with synagogues. Mostly, they are secular. The way they associate with each other is completely informal – within groups of friends and parties. They are not well integrated into Canadian society."

Although there is not much of a language barrier, as most Israelis speak English, they do tend to form friendships with other Hebrew-speaking Jews.

Rabbi Yisroel Landa

"They try to preserve their language, traditions and culture. They read Israeli newspapers, so it's not hard to be immersed in the Israeli society."

She added that some immigrants feel they are doing the wrong thing by leaving Israel and convince themselves that the immigration is temporary.

The second generation is changing. They tend to form relationships with mainstream Jews and tend to be more religious than first-generation immigrants.

She said that many second-generation immigrants gradually begin adopting Jewish traditions, yet they remain distinctive from the rest of the community.

Rabbi Landa said that maintaining a part of their distinctive culture is very important.

"The Israeli mentality and culture is unique and they enjoy sticking to it. They are not looking to become Canadian. If there is a feeling of keeping away, it is because for so many years, there was a feeling that they were unwanted guests here."

He blames Jewish establishments, not individuals, for making Israelis feel unwanted.

The structure of society and the Jewish community are completely different here than in Israel, Rabbi Landa said.

"Israel is a place where there is no separation between religion and state, so the government will provide for religious needs as well. For a child to get an education with the Tanach, he doesn't have to go to a private school."

"There the government will build a synagogue, will provide prayer books, so in Israel there is no need to do anything to belong. Here, every Jew knows he needs to belong somewhere… They go [to shul] – whether they participate is another question – but they belong. In Israel, there is no such thing. If you want to go to shul, you just go. You don't have to pay a membership.

"Also in Israel, the atmosphere in the streets reminds you what time of year it is… There, being a Jew is part of the air that you breathe. Here, it is completely different."

As difficult as it is for Israelis to adapt to a new life in Canada, Rabbi Landa also said that Jewish organizations are making strides in building stronger relationships with Israeli immigrants and hopes the relationships continue to grow.

Language main barrier for integration of Argentine immigrants

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

The story of Argentine immigration to Canada is one of courage, hope and a real desire to become part of another country, culture and people.

These individuals and families came striving for a better life in a new homeland, a place where their children have a viable future.

In general, Argentines are not observant but they are interested in communal life.

"They're used to being part of Jewish culture but not religious activity," says Janice Roth, executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto.

On arrival in Toronto, most aim for full integration into the Jewish community. They have not created separate Argentine organizations, congregated at certain shuls or moved into specific areas of the city, as the South African and Russian immigrants have.

For many Argentines, the move to the city has not been a pleasant one, and they find language is the main barrier when they get here.

For those with only a basic knowledge of English, chances of employment are limited. To make a living in Canada, most of them have to start over.

Another challenge is that most have left their entire support base of family and friends.

For Gabriel and Silvina Appelbaum and their two sons, Nicolas,14, and Federico, 12, of Buenos Aires, the move has been far from easy.

In October 2001, Gabriel Appelbaum lost his job, and after Argentina's economic crash in December 2001, the chances of his finding paid work became non-existent.

"With all the crime, corruption, poverty and violence, there are opportunities for only a few people."he said.

It was then the Applebaums decided to leave.

Although a country like Spain would have been the natural choice for Argentine immigrants because of the language, for most, their only real choices are Australia and Canada because of the countries' open immigration policies.

In the case of the Appelbaums, Silvina had cousins here, who arrived in the 1970s, to give them support when they arrived in Canada.

They applied for residence to Canada in February 2002, but their visas took a year and a half to come through. "There was a lot of wasted time because I spent a year waiting for the visa, and in that time I couldn't find any permanent work in order to make money for my family. I felt very in limbo," said Appelbaum.

One help for the family were Internet forums started by former Argentines who had moved to Canada. The forums are for those thinking about immigration or waiting for their papers to come through. Potential immigrants speak to those living here and get information about life in Canada and what they need to bring and do.

The very first of these forums was Toronto-Baires, but there are many others, including TodoCanada and Argentinos in Toronto.

Eventually the visas came through for the Appelbaums and Gabriel arrived on Canadian shores in December 2003 to begin scouting things out.

Deborah and Ezekiel Diamant (Marcos, father not pictured)

During the three months he was in Toronto on his own, he lived with his wife's cousins and did workshops on how to write a resumé Canadian-style. Within a month and a half, he had a three-month contract position. He said the position was work but not good work for a man with a family – he wasn't earning nearly enough to support a family.

He returned to Buenos Aires in March for his son's bar mitzvah and brought his family back to Toronto.

He now has another temporary job but hopes to find a better and permanent one soon.

The Applebaums have yet to become members of a shul but so far, feel most comfortable at Beth Torah, where they have booked Federico's bar mitzvah for April 2007. "Many Argentines go there and it is similar to the shuls in Argentina," he said.

They have found it pretty difficult to make friends with Canadians. "Canada is a country that accepts immigrants, but I don't know how accepted immigrants are by Canadians," Appelbaum says.

However, slowly they have begun to meet people and form friendships with them. "We have some relationship with people, but it's not friendship yet. Friendship builds up over time," says Appelbaum.

Argentine immigrants find Canadians warm, friendly

But as the Appelbaums meet more Jewish families in Canada, they are beginning to feel a part of the community.

Marcos Diamant, who arrived with his family in April, is quick to say that he and his wife moved for their children, aged two years and eight months.

"Our two choices were Canada and Australia, but Canada had the larger Jewish community and that was very important for us," he said.

They did an exploratory family visit a year before making the move and found that it helped a lot because they were able to speak to fellow Argentine immigrants and get information on day-to-day living in Toronto.

"We received very useful and realistic information and have had no surprises so far," says Diamant.

They have found Canadians to be very welcoming and are eager to become involved in the community.

The Diamant family go to Beth Tzedec or Forest Hill shul every week and say that they chose their shul according to which one would be best to help them integrate with Canadians.

The live near Bathurst Street and St. Clair Avenue, an area where many Jews live, although they are not specifically Argentine. Living in the area is part of the family's integration technique.

As with Appelbaum, Diamant's greatest hardship was finding a job. Now that he finally has one, he aims to work hard to make the temporary position permanent.

Grace Tetelbaum tells a different story.

She and her family came to Canada from Buenos Aires through a Manitoba immigration program, two years ago. It had taken them two years to organize their immigration.

She, her husband Guillermo, and their children, Guizo and Sharon, lived in Winnipeg for their first eight months in Canada, but after realizing that there were no jobs, they moved to Toronto.

Her husband got a job as a driver, while Grace is a freelance graphic designer who works from home.

She says that they felt comfortable in Toronto because it is a "big and beautiful city" and they come from a big city in Argentina.

She says that even though in winter the weather is so cold, "the people are just so warm."

In Argentina, religion didn't play very much of a role in their lives, but today they live close to many other Jewish people in Richmond Hill and are looking for a shul to join.

"For now, our community connection is through JIAS, but soon we hope to become more connected with and involved in the community," says Tetelbaum.

Appelbaum, Diamant and Tetelbaum praised JIAS for the work it does in helping immigrants to settle in and agree that the organization does its best to make it easier for immigrants to integrate into Canadian society.

JIAS was established in 1922 to promote and facilitate the lawful entry of Jewish refugees and immigrants into Toronto, Canada.

According to its mission statement, JIAS works "to advance the well-being of these new arrivals by providing transition and orientation services for integration into the Jewish community of greater Toronto and Canadian society at large."

Today, JIAS is working with 73 Argentine families (although there are an estimated 80 or 90 families in Toronto), helping them to find employment and affordable accommodation, and putting them in touch with settled fellow Argentine immigrants for support, as well as Canadians.

"The difficulty for JIAS," said Applebaum, "is that every immigrant family has a different story and needs help with different things."

He added that the immigration process begins once an application for residence has been sent and he says that help in those earlier stages would make the integration easier.

Being South African in Toronto

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Immigration can be a horrendous experience no matter who you are, where you come from or the circumstances surrounding your move.

"One is never immediately accepted into a new community and has to work hard to become part of one," said South African immigrant Alan Sandler in a recent interview.

Quite a strong comment from a man who has held some of the top Toronto community lay leadership positions over the years, including that of president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and is currently chair of JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Society).

Colin Baskind and Heather Super

He believes South African immigrants are often successful here because they come as educated English speakers who are aware of the inner workings of community organizations through past involvement. They then get involved wherever else they can as an extra means of integration.

"There were a whole slew of South Africans who were involved in the South African community, and so they naturally did the same here. For many, it was natural to move into UJA Federation positions and it provided an easy integration route," Sandler said. As an example, he mentioned David Zion, vice-president of UJA finance, who has two other South Africans working with him.

Keith Landy is another community leader who came here from South Africa – among other positions he has held, he is the immediate past president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Landy, a partner in the law firm of Landy, Marr & Associates and a member of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, was born in England and lived in South Africa for 13 years before moving to Canada more than 30 years ago. While in Johannesburg, he was active in several youth groups, including Habonim, Betar and Bnei Akiva.

Immigrants with school-aged children took on positions on the school boards and within the parent bodies – as they would have done in South Africa.

Former 'Joburger' Mark Skapinker, a managing partner of Brightspark Ventures, a venture capital company for the software industry, immigrated to Canada with his wife after first spending six years in Israel.

When their children reached school age and attended Bialik Hebrew Day School, Skapinker became chairman of the school's board, a position he held for five years.

He noted that both the principal and head of the senior division were also former South Africans.

Former Johannesburg high school English teacher and head of English at one of the biggest Jewish day schools there, Bernice Goldstein, moved to Canada four years ago, and within 10 days had a job at USDS.

She says it was an easy transition for her "because the Jewish day school systems are so similar."

She has since met many old friends from Johannesburg teaching circles, and "all have done well and are happy teaching in their respective Canadian schools."

Although there has always been a trickle of South African immigration to Canada, there were two main waves that brought the vast majority of "boeremanne" – one after the Soweto riots of 1976 and another after the state of emergency was declared in 1985.

For most, if not all, political unrest and fear for the safety of their children spurred them to leave.

"When we left South Africa in 1973, there was no end in sight for the apartheid era. If someone had said that [F.W.] De Klerk would allow [Nelson] Mandela out of prison and open up democratic elections, nobody would have believed him. We just didn't feel that there was any future there for us as Jews," said Sandler, who made the move with his wife Lorraine and their two children, then aged nine and seven.

Doula provides information and support during pregnancy

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Chaya Smukler with twins she helped bring into the world.

Call her a doula, labour coach, labour support, or, the latest term, monitrice – Chaya Smukler isn't particular. What matters, she said, is the emotional, physical and information support she gives a woman and her family during this "intense time."

"People need information and support so that they can stay calm," she believes.

A doula, she stressed, is neither a nurse nor a midwife, although some have had extra training that enables them to check heart rate or to do internal examinations to determine dilation. Most, however, don't do these things.

Doulas learn their craft from mentors – experienced doulas who offer on-the-job training and instruction.

Smukler has been doing the job for some 30 years and talks enthusiastically about seeing babies she helped give birth to having bar mitzvahs or coming to her for help with their own deliveries.

She became a doula almost by accident. When she and her husband, Henry, now a chiropractor, were first married, they were superintendents of an apartment building while he finished his education. Several of the residents were pregnant, and some unexpectedly went into labour and had their babies in their apartments. Smukler was called to assist. And the rest is history, she said with a chuckle.

Women call to book her services almost as soon as their pregnancy is confirmed. While she is available by phone from then on, the first face to face appointment is between 11 and 13 weeks, when, she said delicately, the chance of miscarriage is low.

Smukler has taken a number of courses on nutrition, and that is one of her focuses. She advises on proper diet, exercise and ways to combat the nausea of early pregnancy. Some of her suggestions include ginger tea, vitamin B6, cool air (for example, by using a hand fan) or acupuncture wrist bands.

A pregnant woman, she said, must get enough sleep, at least eight hours a night, adding a nap in the ninth month. ("You need a lot of stamina to go through labour.")

Smukler said she likes it when the couple come to see her together, so that she can answer questions from both of them.

She offers prenatal classes, which she begins in the seventh month. If a couple take classes elsewhere, she has an intensive session, lasting two to three hours, at 36 weeks.

"We make a labour and delivery plan – do they want, for instance, to deliver in a Jacuzzi, do they want to labour at home for most of the time or come into the hospital right away? Or do they want to have the baby at home altogether?"

She goes over the stages of labour, makes sure that they have the breathing down pat, and deals with questions and anxieties.

During the last month, and especially after each doctor's visit, there is frequent telephone communication. "I have a 24-hour pager with a special code, so that I know if it is an emergency, just a general question or something in between."

When labour starts, Smukler goes with the couple to the hospital, and forms part of the team, which includes the doctor, nurses or midwife.

"We help the team to be a unit and to function smoothly," she said.

After the birth, she visits the family, and offers advice about such matters as breastfeeding.

Smukler, a follower of Lubavitch (two of her seven children are shlichim, emissaries of the rebbe) sees childbirth as profoundly spiritual. "At the moment of childbirth, the gates of heaven are open, and you can pray for other people. We think of a bride doing that under the chupah, but not at this time."

Many of her clients – not all, by any means – are Orthodox Jews. According to Halachah, a husband is not permitted to touch his wife during labour. A doula can take his place, touching, stroking, applying pressure, washing the face with a cool cloth – anything it takes to make the woman more comfortable.

There are now a number of Jewish doulas, Smukler said, many trained by her. In fact, she said, "we want to start a Jewish doulas' association."

Being a labour coach is not Smukler's only activity. She is also a reflexologist (reflexology is a form of natural healing that says points on the feet and hands correspond to various parts of the body, and stimulating and applying pressure to those points act positively on those body parts). She noted that she sometimes uses reflexology on her labouring patients, with very good results.

Kosher food guru tests her creations on family

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Esther Schwartz got married 57 years ago, she learned to cook to please her husband Murray.

She still surprises him with new dishes, but she has turned what was then a hobby into a string of cooking accomplishments that are attested to in a two-page curriculum vitae and a wall full of plaques in her home office.

Perhaps most well known in the Jewish community as the kosher food consultant to the Kashruth Council of Canada, Schwartz prepares the menus and recipes that are mailed out four times a year before major Jewish holidays, and she works on the Kashruth directory, a guide to kosher establishments in the city.

She says that along with Cynthia Gasner, director of information and public relations at the Kashruth Council, they send out about 6,000 recipe flyers at a time. She can't even estimate, though, how many people actually see and use the recipes, because recipients copy them and send them on to friends and relatives around the world.

Esther Schwartz with her collection of cookbooks

Her involvement in the community doesn't stop there, though. After attending meetings of the Canadian Diabetes Association, Schwartz, who is diabetic, started up a Jewish diabetes chapter because she realized that there was no information available for kosher diets.

"I held a meeting for people interested in starting a Jewish chapter and I got good response. We now get between 75 and 100 people at each meeting.

"We have speakers and we offer recipes specific to a particular Jewish holiday. [Our mandate] is to educate people beyond their doctor's advice. We want them to know they can eat well and control their diabetes."

Taught kosher cooking for 32 years

Over the years, she has also taught home economics at Eitz Chaim Schools, developed a cooking program at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and taught kosher cooking classes at synagogues and community organizations. She was also a bronze medal winner at Israel's First International Conference and Exhibition on Jewish Culinary Art in 1978.

In 1996 she teamed up with Thelma Barer-Stein and Risa Vandersluis to write To Life: Setting A new Standard for Delectable Healthy Eating within Cherished Kosher Tradition, a cookbook that promotes healthy kosher eating.

Her professional cooking career took off, Schwartz says, after taking a baking class with well-known local cook Lillian Kaplun. "I had just taken a public speaking course to boost my self confidence, and when Lillian needed someone to do a talk on eggs, I volunteered."

Shortly afterward, Gasner asked her to conduct kosher cooking classes at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, and although the venue changed over the years, she continued the classes for 32 years.

"I developed some recipes, I adapted others, and I tested all of them on my husband, my four children, and my [now] eight grandchildren. They are my tasters, testers and critics. I test and retest until it is up to par. If one of my children says, 'What smells so good?' I know I'm on the right track."

Her standards are high, she says. "Every recipe has to be interesting, nutritious and delicious. The Chinese have a saying: 'You appeal to the eye through the colour, to the palate by the taste, to the ear by the crunch, and to the nose by the aroma.' I follow that whenever I can. A good recipe is like sterling silver. It grows on you."

She advises her students to be organized, and to not be worried about failure. "You can always try again. If you're a novice, follow the recipe exactly, then when it is perfected you can add or subtract some ingredients."

Cooking today is different than when she was a young bride, says Schwartz. "Everything now is fast, fast. We also get wonderful foods from around the world. When I was growing up we never even used squash or eggplant.

"Especially in the past 20 years, people want low-fat, easy-to-follow recipes. No one uses schmaltz anymore. I remember melting down my schmaltz, adding onions, and putting it in the fridge to harden. My husband once took a drink of it before it solidified.

"My mother used to use lots of butter when she made blintzes. Now, I put a teaspoon of oil in the batter, and just grease the pan a little. As for kishke, I would never teach that now. I used to show them how to stuff it, sew it together and drop it in boiling water."

Jewish food is a tradition, she says, "and I want to teach people tradition. I think it is important for children to learn to cook. My daughter is an excellent cook, and I've taught my children and grandchildren how to make challah buns."

Throughout her career, she has never looked for fame and glory, she says. "I just want satisfaction."

Does she ever think about retiring? "I think about it, but I don't plan on it."

Textbook co-author loves to learn

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Don't call Jack Lipinsky a lifelong learner. The United Synagogue Day School teacher, who received his PhD in history two years ago from the University of Toronto, is not fond of the term, apt as it may be.

"I actually like to learn," he said in an interview earlier this summer. "I'm excited about what I learn, and I pass that on to my students. I think that what I teach is interesting."

In April, Lipinsky, 48, was nominated for the Governor General's Award for Excellence in Teaching Canadian History. Then, in May, he was named a Teacher of Excellence, a privately sponsored award for Toronto Jewish day school teachers.

He is the co-author of a new junior high textbook, Telling Our Story: A History of the Jews in Canada to 1920, that will be used in some Jewish day schools this year. The book – a four-year project inspired by the BJE's Etgar (Challenge) program for teachers – was co-authored with two colleagues, USDS teacher Donnie Friedman, and Meir Balofsky, a teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools who has since made aliyah.

"I have my fingers in many pies," said Lipinsky, who also teaches Canadian history at U of T's School of Continuing Studies; serves as adult education chair and brotherhood president of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation; and runs Shabbat morning and holiday services at the Stashover-Slipia Congregation.

But his most important role, he said, is "playing Daddy" to his three children, Baruch, 19, Yoelit, 17, and Yehezkel, 13. In fact, he missed his PhD convocation to attend the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto awards night, where Baruch was among those students honoured.

Lipinsky's interest in Jewish education was sparked as a 17-year-old, first-year university student, when he began teaching afternoon Hebrew school at Adath Israel Congregation. A graduate of the Jewish high school program there, he found he liked teaching. "It was a nice source of extra money, and it was fun."

Later, when he was working on his master's in history at U of T, he took the BJE's "Midrasha L'Morim" program over three summers to become certified as a Judaic studies teacher.

Lipinsky's PhD thesis focused on the organizational behaviour of Toronto Jewry from 1933 to 1943. He entered the PhD program in 1980, but put things on hold after his oldest son was born. At the time, he was a teaching assistant at U of T's Scarborough campus, taught at two Hebrew schools, spent his Saturday mornings at Stashover-Slipia, and worked part-time at USDS as a librarian.

His introduction to teaching at the day school started when he was asked to pinch-hit for a sick colleague. According to Lipinsky, Aaron Nussbaum, then educational director of the school, walked into the classroom expecting to see "pandemonium," but to his surprise students were busy working on an assignment that Lipinsky had devised on the spur of the moment.

Eventually, he ended up teaching junior high classes in both Jewish and general studies. "Junior high kids are full of hormones, but they're also full of ideas. If you get them onside, you can have such fun with them."

The secret, he says, is respect, not intimidation.

Lipinsky, who attended public school in the Keele Street and Sheppard Avenue area and later went to William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, tries not to be like the Hebrew school teachers who told him, "Don't ask so many questions," and "When you get older, you'll understand."

Despite that, he always had an affinity for tradition. But, he said, "life is like a craps game, and I want to stack the odds in favour of Jewish survival. The more kids learn about how intelligent our religion and culture and heritage are, the less likely they are to 'dis' it."

Although Lipinsky and his wife Barbara have become more observant over the years, he stressed that although he teaches at a Conservative school, he's "not there to proselytize Orthodoxy. I'm there to get them to choose a Jewish lifestyle in a knowledgeable manner."

Judaism is a smorgasbord, he said, and his job is to put the dishes in front of the students.

One of the most meaningful services he has attended, he said, was at Congregation Darchei Noam, Toronto's only Reconstructionist synagogue. "The people there were incredibly into their service."

Because of his Judaic skills and knowledge, Lipinsky has been, on one occasion, mistakenly referred to as a rabbi.

He's not, he clarifies, although he hasn't ruled out the possibility of studying for smichah – for fun.

Wardrobe doctor dresses the whole woman

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The best way to describe Marilyn Wetston (pronounced Weston) is that she has a firecracker mind that ignites with creative ideas.

Known to her friends and clients as the wardrobe doctor, Wetston is a successful entrepreneur, retailer, teacher, closet organizer, radio and television personality, and a facilitator who helps women to become successful.

The brown-eyed blond, who has a passion for everything she does, says that her parents' lives have been a great influence on her on a personal level and in the business world.

Her Polish-born parents, Pola and Oscar Schlenger, both Holocaust survivors, met and married in a displaced prison camp in Austria after the war. They each had suffered through many concentration camps and lost most of their families.

You dress the whole person— not just the outside

Wetston was born in the camp in Austria and the Schlengers came to Canada when she was a year old. She says her father had little education but a tremendous talent for business. From her father she inherited his business acumen and from her mother Wetston got her love of literature and music.

The family moved to Toronto where, Wetston says, her father began selling small items from a baby carriage to people in the Polish community, as he spoke only Polish. Then they moved to Welland and he opened a retail store there called Oscar's Bargain Centre.

"My father lived by a handshake, and so do I. From the time I could walk, I was in the store. I made selling a child's game. I came by the world of business honestly," Wetston says.

Wetston attended the University of Toronto, where she majored in English, and her parents moved back to Toronto and opened Oscar's Surplus Jobbers on Spadina Avenue at Dundas Street.

"I always worked with my father, even after I was married and my son and daughter were born," she says.

"My first solo business venture was in 1975, when I bought a bankrupt stock of ladies and children's clothing. I opened in the basement at 195 Spadina Ave., where there was no storefront, no signage, no heat and people had to change in the bathroom."

From that humble beginning, and an odyssey through several upgraded facilities and more and more buying, she now operates a large women's clothing store, Marilyn's, at 200 Spadina Ave. Her office is near the entrance of the store because she says that she gets energy from people.

"I took the path of dressing women. You dress a person – not just the external features but the whole entity of who they are," Wetston says.

She presents fashion-image workshops, speaks at fundraisers and has written for magazines and local newspapers. She has written about how to organize a closet – "because I like healing dysfunctional closets," she says – and how to pack a suitcase. She currently writes a column for Women of Vision magazine.

Marilyn Wetston is a successful entrepreneur, retailer, teacher, closet organizer, radio and television personality, and facilitator of opportunities for women.

Wetston's radio show, From a Woman's Perspective, is on AM 740 Sundays from 8 to 9 a.m. On the show, she explores different topics with Canadian guest experts. She also has an Internet radio show, A Woman's Perspective: Image, Fashion, Life Style, at ladybuglive.com.

To add to her busy schedule, Wetston is dedicated to helping women who desire to be in business but don't have the time or money. "My incubator program is designed to educate and empower women and support women entrepreneurs. I'm happy to share my experience with women from all walks of life," she says. Her program includes seminars at which women can demonstrate their projects and expertise.

Wetston will soon appear on a CHEX-TV show, Durham Today, on which she will choose a new outfit for the host to wear.

"I'm a clothing addict," she says. "I love dressing well, and I always use real women to demonstrate the art of dressing."

It is ironic that her parents' lives were destroyed in Poland and Wetston was recently invited twice to lecture to university students in Poland on deportment, image and entrepreneurship.

"I am a very curious person, and I am on a learning.curve and always explore new avenues," she says. "I take every day as it comes – you do what you can and you go forward."

With so many activities on her agenda, she still finds time to play golf and looks forward to the time she spends with family.

"I would like to continue on a joyous adventure through life, and I am very lucky that my husband, Sam, supports me in everything I do and lets me be the best I can be," Wetston says.

Cantor Trubashnik's role extends beyond the temple

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If Anna Trubashnik, cantor and music director at Temple Emanu-El for the past 15 years, could start her career over, she'd change only one thing.

"The end result would be the same. Only the path would be different," says the 44-year-old mother of three.

Recently certified by the Hebrew Union College Institute of Religion in New York, Trubashnik is now the only certified female cantor in Canada with an active pulpit.

The certification process, a five-year exam-based course, is designed for people working full time, she says.

"It is a very exciting course, but it is twice as hard as going to school, because there is no teacher support and there are no classmates. It is basically self-study.

"I have a husband, I am raising a family and I am working, and I had to travel to New York for exams. If I had known what it entailed, I might have thought harder."

Her mentor, Cantor Benjamin Maisner, of Holy Blossom Temple, has played an important role in her career, she says.

Born in Moscow, Trubashnik lived in Israel and Belgium before moving to Canada 25 years ago.

Music is in her genes from way back, she says. Her father is an oboist, her mother is a pianist, her grandfather was a violinist, and her grandmother performed in Yiddish theatre in Odessa. "There were rabbis on my mother's side of the family, so I've come full circle."

Living in Belgium, Trubashnik started training at age 14. She received her artist diploma from the Brussels Conservatory in voice, piano and choral conducting, and then joined the Brussels Opera Company.

"I was headed for an operatic career, but when I moved to Canada I became close friends with [the late composer] Srul Glick, and he told me they were looking for a cantor at the temple. He encouraged me to audition.

"I was extremely pregnant at the time with my second child, and they hired me right off. It was an interesting challenge to sing at the High Holy Day services shortly after my daughter was born."

She had never been involved in the Reform movement, she says, "and I took to it completely. I love the philosophy. To me, an egalitarian service is very important.

"[The temple] has become a little more traditional since I arrived and it appeals to me. They are using more Hebrew and more traditional prayer chants, and all the men are wearing kippot and tallitot."

Music is integral to the service, cantor says

Becoming a cantor has fulfilled a tremendous passion, she says. "A cantor is central to the service. What would [a service be] without music? It would be words and speeches.

"Music is an integral component. Even if a person does not understand the words, the music gives them a feeling of what is going on.

"Niggunim are chassidic melodies without words, and they uplift the spirit through the melody."

She stresses that a cantor is not a performer. "That is not my intention; it is my intention to uplift the congregation through prayer. I pray with them."

Trubashnik performs at all life-cycle events, she says, and now that she is a certified cantor, she is recognized by the government as a cleric so she can perform marriages.

After being with the congregation for 15 years, she has officiated at congregants' baby namings, bar or bat mitzvahs weddings and funerals.

"I feel it is a great honour to officiate at a funeral because it is the last thing I can do for a congregant. It is a great mitzvah."

There are also pastoral elements to her position, including counselling and hospital visits. "I often take the hand of a sick person and sing to them. People are gratified when I come."

As well, she teaches bnai mitzvah students and works with the choir.

'I often take the hand of a sick person and sing to them'

Her congregants are her friends, she says. "I see them through the wonderful and the not so wonderful. They become part of my life."

A member of the Toronto Council of Chazzanim and the American Conference of Cantors, Trubashnik also gives private voice lessons, and is on the faculty of Kolel – the Institute for Adult Jewish Learning, and Camp George, operated by the Union for Reform Judaism.

At Kolel, she has started a program in which members of the Russian community can learn about Judaism and the Torah in Russian.

Being a cantor is a good life, she says, "as long as you don't expect a nine-to-five job. You have to give of yourself. I cannot stress 'serving the community' enough.

"A beautiful voice is a bonus, but it is not enough. You start with the voice, and then you ask yourself [if it's for you]."

Young adults take leadership roles at Shaare Zedek, UJA

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More and more young adults in their 30s and 40s are taking major leadership positions that will help ensure the future of Jewish communities in Canada and Israel.

Brad Fox, 39, and David Smith, 42, have recently completed five years as co-presidents of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation. Both are members of the hospital's international board of governors.

Fox is now the vice-chair of the 2006 UJA fundraising campaign and on the professional advisory committee of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Eventually, your charitable work and your professional life interface," says Fox, who is a financial advisor with CIBC World Markets.

"My experience in the service industry, combined with my interest in the community, has enhanced my focus on planned giving."

Born in Vancouver, Fox moved to Toronto in 1989. "I didn't know a soul in the city – no friends, family, or even an acquaintance to call upon for help. In the face of adversity, I reached out, particularly to Jewish Family and Child Services of UJA. They helped me through my first difficult year in Toronto.

"Now, with a solid career established, I am able to give back to the community that was there for me when I was in need. My hope for our Jewish community is that there will always be a place for people to go to when they are in need."

Shortly after he arrived in Toronto, Fox was invited to a wine-tasting and awareness-raising event for Shaare Zedek Hospital.

"That's when I met David and some 30 people. I became involved because there were a lot of people who where very passionate about the hospital, and I learned a lot from them. It's very hard to find the level of commitment of volunteers that you find at Shaare Zedek."

Fox chaired a golf tournament and the hospital's new leadership group, and stepped into the co-chair position with Smith in 2000.

In 1993, Fox married Rona Schwartz, a retired lawyer. They have three children, twins Adam and Zoey, 8, and Rachel, 5.

"My family may suffer because I am so involved. They may lose some time with me, but what they gain through my activities [is that] at a young age, they are developing their values and beliefs, as I include them whenever I can."

Explaining why many things are linked in communal work, he said one of the reasons he became involved with the federation was to have their missions to Israel take the groups to the Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem to see the outstanding services it provides.

Smith, who is the senior executive at Maple Leaf Firelog Products Company of Canada, is responsible for all aspects of the operation, and he oversees sales in Europe.

In addition to being active at Shaare Zedek since 1989, Smith has worked for State of Israel Bonds and has been one of the top fundraisers for the Baycrest Challenge and is currently helping with Baycrest's Boardwalk.

Born in Toronto, Smith moved to Ottawa in 1984 to open the first of five Benetton Group stores. In 1988, he returned to Toronto and married Karen Solursh, the leasing manager at Runnymede Development Corporation. The Smiths have four children, Joshua, 14, Jeremy, 12, Annie, 8, and Jesse, 5.

Smith became involved in Shaare Zedek when his father-in-law, Harvey Solursh, was the national president.

"He suggested that I consider the new leadership group."

Before long, Smith became the new leadership chair, founded the organization's annual golf tournament and served on several committees.

Smith says the most important thing in life is balance. "At times," he says, "it can be a challenge balancing schedules, but with the support of my wife who is also on the Shaare Zedek board, I can dedicate the time.

"Karen and I work together. She may not be able to attend all the meetings, but she remains involved. We both feel we need people to come forward and offer their support to the many great institutions in Israel -- and we have chosen Shaare Zedek."

He adds that his children have also been involved. "They have helped out at the Shaare Zedek office with mailings and they have seen some of the presentations made by doctors from the hospital.

"Shaare Zedek is our connection with Israel. It is important to give back to your community, be it in Canada or in Israel. If we don't, who will?"

He enthusiastically notes the advancements at Shaare Zedek. "Their many areas of excellence include the Women and Infant Centre for pre- and post-natal care, the Heart Centre and the recently opened Department of Emergency Medicine."

As Fox and Smith complete their term as co-presidents, they note that another young leader, Jeffrey Rosenthal, 41, who is a managing partner and co-founder of Imperial Capital and has been active on the board, was recently elected national president.

"Jeff brings a wealth of business and community experience to Shaare Zedek," Smith says. "I know that he will be successful in leading the organization to even greater levels of support for the hospital and our community."

Frum bubbie hooked on Guyana

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

After her first mission there, Leya Aronson was hooked on Guyana, in South America.

Before that first mission, her family thought she was going through a midlife crisis and an Israeli nephew addressed a letter to her as "Doda [Aunt] Tarzan."

But after going on her seventh two-week-long mission this year, the Orthodox mother, bubbie and registered nurse who is a volunteer for Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee has proven her dedication to the people she helps deep in that region.

Since 1998 Ve'ahavta volunteers have travelled to the impoverished country sometime between mid-January and mid-March to treat acute illnesses, improve health-care infrastructure and enhance communities through education and community development. They work in partnership with other groups, setting up travelling clinics to treat the local population.

Leya Aronson with a young patient.

The name Ve'ahavta refers to the Torah injunction to love one's neighbour, or stranger, as oneself. The organization was established in 1996 and is registered in Canada and the United States. Its goal is to play a role in tikkun olam (repairing the world) through partnerships with the Canadian and American Jewish community, as well as with non-Jewish and international organizations worldwide.

"We try to show the world that the Jews aren't insulated and only interested in helping themselves," said Aronson.

All the people who go on the missions are volunteers, with groups ranging in size from 12 to 18 members.

"The plane we fly on is only an eight-seater – my husband's old car was bigger," Aronson said with a laugh.

But Ve'ahavta and Aronson's efforts are not only focused on Guyana but other projects too.

Recently, Ve'ahavta partnered with the Herbie Fund of the Hospital for Sick Children and the Salvation Army to facilitate the transportation, accommodation and surgery required to separate conjoined Zimbabwean twins, Tinashe and Tinotenda, in Toronto.

When the twins arrived at Sick Kids, Aronson, who is clinical nursing leader of ward 7C at the hospital, began looking out for the babies to ensure that their transition into the hospital would be smooth.

The twins have since returned home to Zimbabwe following a successful operation.

The program model for the Guyana mission is unique and successful, ensuring that year after year, at least half of the team consists of returning volunteers, some of whom are participating in their fifth, sixth, 10th or 33rd trip to provide free medical care to some of Guyana's neediest communities.

Aronson is one of these die-hard returnees.

One would imagine that being an Orthodox Jew on such a mission could be nothing short of a challenge but Aronson said "not at all."

She and Dennis Scolnik, an emergency-room physician at Sick Kids who also goes on the annual missions, take kosher supplies with them – dehydrated foods, utensils and foil to cover counters when they prepare meals. For Shabbat, they take matzah, a challah cover, challah for the first Shabbat candles and candlesticks, a havdalah set and wine.

Most of the locations at which they work have cook fires, so they are able to boil water. "More of a problem is finding drinkable water," Aronson said.

Regarding Shabbat, most of the region's people are Seventh Day Adventists, "which means that Shabbat is Shabbat," she said.

One Friday afternoon, a few minutes before Shabbat, Aronson and Scolnik heard bells ringing "like the bells of Jerusalem calling in Shabbat," she said.

All the Guyanese people came out dressed in white, at least, as white as their clothing can be, considering it is difficult for them to find clean river water in which to wash their garments, and made their way to their evening service.

Someone saw Aronson lighting candles and called all the women, who stood around her and watched. Then when Scolnik recited kiddush, all the men stood respectfully in line before going home.

"When you have experiences like this, how can you not go back," said Aronson.

Although they do not work on Shabbat, if a patient shows up needing urgent care, there is no question it would be dealt with, Aronson said.

The work they do is nothing short of extraordinary, but that is nothing new for this lady.

After all, Aronson started nursing school when her youngest daughter went to Grade 1.

"We would sit at the table and do our homework together – we went through school together," she said.

Nursing was not an option for observant people in the past as hospitals did not have kosher food and trainee nurses had to work on Shabbat.

But nursing had been Aronson's childhood dream. She even has a photograph of herself and her cousin bandaging a cat as children. Her cousin is kneeling on the floor bandaging, while Aronson, dressed as a nurse, is assisting.

Over the years, Aronson would apply and reapply to nursing school, but inevitably, something would be standing in her way.

A mother of six, Aronson nursed her daughter, sick with Tay-Sachs, a fatal inherited disease of the central nervous system, until she died. "Nursing her just came naturally and so, after she died, I started to volunteer at Sick Kids as a special volunteer."

After a while, she applied for nursing training again. She was accepted and started within three days.

When her children were younger, Aronson worked full-time while maintaining her family life. She took off the summers and went to camp with her children as the nurse.

Looking forward, Aronson said her dream travel destination is China.

"I want to go to Kaifeng and see what happened to the Jewish community there. I am also studying elementary Cantonese and can speak very basically to the grandmothers who bring children into Sick Kids."

But for now, she will continue going to Guyana, she said.

"We are the only medical personnel that these people see and I have met phenomenally interesting people. The friendships just keep pulling me back."

Psychologist is a woman of multiple intelligences

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

If Karen Oster had to describe herself using the criteria associated with multiple intelligences – a theory put forth in the 1980s by Harvard University education professor Howard Gardner – she would say she's "a very visual and auditory learner, and very kinesthetic."

The latter quality is reflected in her ceramic work and the verdant garden she enjoys tending at the home she shares with her husband, Ray, a retired businessman. The house itself, a 77-year-old former rooming house replete with wood, stained glass and quirky nooks is filled with plants, pottery, and textile art from faraway places.

An educational consultant who has a long association with the Bloorview MacMillan Centre (formerly the Hugh MacMillan Rehabilitation Centre), Oster is a veteran academic, researcher and conference presenter. She has travelled to the Philippines and Sri Lanka to work with local teachers as a volunteer adviser with the Canadian Executive Service Organization, a branch of the Canadian International Development Agency and, as of last year, is co-ordinator of student support services at United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS).

Oster's background is mainly in the area of integration of special needs children. At the Hugh MacMillan Centre, she was founder and director of Play and Learn, the first integrated infant and early childhood education program in Toronto.

At USDS, where Oster has been an educational consultant at the preschool level since 2000, her focus is on supporting diverse learning styles, an approach based on the principle of multiple intelligences. Oster helps teachers develop a "differentiated classroom," so that each student can learn in an optimal way, whether he or she understands new material best through visual, auditory, tactile or other means.

"I'm totally excited about looking at education in that way," she said. "You can't do every lesson in eight different ways, but based on who you have in your classroom, you can ensure that for some subject areas and activities, there are choices that reflect the different multiple intelligences that exist in your classroom. You're teaching to strengths, but you're also creating opportunities for kids to grow in all different intelligences."

Karen Oster

Although Oster didn't set out to work with special needs children when she began her graduate studies in psychology, her interest in the field dates back to her teenage years. A native of Saskatoon, where her father Sam Lifshen was a longtime president of the local Jewish community, Oster spent many summers on staff at Camp Easter Seal, just outside her hometown. She said she was "totally inspired" by how hard the campers worked to succeed at everything they did.

More recently, her international work in the field has been humbling. "You have to take what you know and rework it for a culture and a group of people that are very different than you. You have to honour who they are and what they bring to the table. It has been an incredible learning experience for me," she said.

Oster moved to Toronto in the 1960s to pursue her master's degree at what was then a fledgling psychology department at York University. "They offered scholarships, and Toronto seemed like a big, sophisticated city. I knew nobody, and I thought it would be a wonderful adventure. I had no plans to stay, but life presents itself in different kinds of ways."

Her husband, she said, was one of the few native Torontonians that she met as a graduate student. They have two sons, now in their 30s, and recently became grandparents for the first time, with another grandchild on the way.

She credits Ray for shouldering much of the child-care and household duties when their boys were young and she was working on her doctorate, which she completed in 1984.

When Oster began her master's program in the mid-1960s, it wasn't common for women to do graduate work, nor to try to balance work and parenting.

"I think we were a group of women who felt it was important to try and do everything and be everything, so we worked very hard at trying to balance work and play and home life... [The 1970s and early 1980s were] a time of change and transformation, and at the same time a wonderful opportunity to explore."

An active grandmother, Oster is a biker and swimmer who took up kayaking this year. "I think you're never too old to try things."

Musing on her 60th birthday, which she celebrated in January, Oster said, "I think our milestone birthdays give us a chance to reflect. I think there's a wistfulness about it, in terms of recognition of the life span, and at the same time there's an incredible gratefulness. I am so lucky."

Big Brothers/Sisters are friends, mentors and role models

By PAUL LUNGEN

One of Robert Galambos' two boys – the eight-year- old –loves cars and everything to do with them, so when they go out on the weekend, chances are they'll end up at a car dealership, kicking tires and checking out the new models. The other, the 12-year-old, loves action, so a trip to White Water Kingdom would be his outing of choice.

Robert Galambos

For Galambos, weekend excursions are a regular feature of his life and those of the two brothers. It gives them a chance to bond, to talk, to have fun and to grow together.

For all, it's a special time, particularly because Galambos doesn't have to be doing what he's doing. Galambos, after all, isn't the boys' father. He's not even their uncle or a relative. Galambos is the boys' Big Brother, a volunteer with Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) who spends at least four hours a week with the brothers.

Galambos does what a big brother would do; he's a mentor and a role model – someone the kids can look up to.

It's something he does because he loves kids and, even though "it sounds corny, give back to society."

Pamela Shulman

Galambos, 48, came to JF&CS a little over a year ago, ready to volunteer and eager to get involved in community work in Toronto after he'd moved from Montreal. He'd been involved as a volunteer in community activities in Quebec and had heard good things about Big Brother programs.

"I thought I'd be good at it too," he said.

Pamela Shulman is Big Sister to an 11-year-old girl who she's been with for two years. While Big Brothers and Big Sisters are supposed to be giving of themselves for the benefit of others, she, like Galambos, readily admits she gets a lot out of the relationship.

Her little sister is really fun to be with, she said. "She is very energetic, she gives me energy and she makes me feel young. She's great company and fun to be with. I love her very much."

Thanks to her time with the 11-year-old, "I get to enjoy things I wouldn't otherwise do," Shulman, 34, said.

Among the activities the two have enjoyed are shopping, movies and going to the kids' play amusement park on Centre Island. Although she's committed to spending four hours a week with her little sister, "mostly because we enjoy each other's company, the activities actually take longer than four hours."

Andrea Pines, co-ordinator of volunteer services at JF&CS, said getting a good match between Big Brothers and the kids is the key to success. The best partnerships occur when both sides share the same interests, skills and hobbies.

"It has to be an appropriate placement, the best match for the child," she said.

Once their paired, it's up to the big and little brothers to set their own agenda and schedule, she continued, whether it's throwing a ball around, swimming, skating, enjoying arts and crafts, cooking or going to movies. They're also free to attend the regular events, particularly around the Jewish holidays, sponsored for them by JF&CS and funded by the Larry Grossman Foundation for Kids.

Having a Big Brother or Big Sister can have a major impact on children, she said. A positive role model can teach kids how to interact better with others, give them guidance about personal issues and demonstrate how to behave properly in the wider world.

"We look for a level of maturity, someone we can trust, someone who understands working with kids," she said.

Often, the JF&CS clients who need a Big Brother or Big Sister have something missing in their lives. It might be a broken home, an illness in the family that makes the parent unavailable, abuse, or some other unfortunate circumstance.

"Big Brothers and Big Sisters are there as a friend, mentor, role model. They teach life skills," Pines said.

Applicants for the role are screened extensively before they meet a child. They are interviewed, asked to present letters of reference, undergo a police check and afterward are evaluated on a regular basis.

JF&CS assigns from 25 to 30 adults to kids in need, but there is a shortage of both Big Brothers and Big Sisters. Ten boys are currently waiting for Big Brothers, while half that many girls need Big Sisters. Big Brothers are needed in York Region, and women are being sought in the area south of Lawrence.

Though JF &CS asks applicants to commit to at least one year, "most stay longer." Many find they develop close attachments to their young charges. One little sister marched in her Big Sister's wedding procession, Pines noted.

In at least two other cases, a little brother and a little sister grew up to become Big Brothers and Big Sisters themselves.

"They want to give back to the community," she said. "[They know] they can really turn around a kid's life."

Beth Emeth's ritual director is a technology maven

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Danny Allman is the effervescent, multi-tasking ritual director of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

"My life is bound up in my job 60 to 70 hours a week," he says.

Since he took the position as ritual director in 1993, his job description has evolved. Along with his many activities as ritual director, he is the building manager and the shul's technology and computer maven.

"We have a computer committee at Beth Emeth. We led the way and have been in the forefront of technology, which meshed with my background," he says.

Allman, 54, was born in Edmonton. He attended the Edmonton Talmud Torah, which then went to Grade 6, and continued evening classes to Grade 9.

In 1971, he spent a year in Israel on Bnei Akiva's Hachsharah work/study program. On his return to Canada, he studied electronics technology at Toronto's Devry Institute of Technology.

"My passion is technology and everywhere I worked, I became involved in this field," he says.

In 1974, he interrupted his studies to volunteer in Israel on Kibbutz Be'erot Yitzchak after the Yom Kippur War as there was a shortage of young men. He drove a truck hauling agricultural products to market.

As a teenager, he attended Camp Moshava, where he met Miriam Wisebrod. He worked for the Toronto Jewish Congress (the predecessor of the UJA Federation) and married Miriam in 1976. For the past four years, she has been the director of Camp Moshava, where Allman is the chair of the site management committee.

Ardent Zionists, the Allmans moved to Israel in 1978. Their son, Elyasaf, was born the following year on Kibbutz Be'erot Yitzchak. They then moved to Hebron, and Allman served in the Israel Defence Forces' infantry division.

They returned to Canada, Allman says, after buying a house, which was to be completed in one year, in Ma'aleh Adumin. "We came back to Canada because of parnassah. It was a time of hyper-inflation, and although we were paying the mortgage, in four years the house was still not finished." Allman says.

Danny Allman

In Toronto, where his daughter, Danit, was born, he worked for Golan Alarms. Then he moved to Calgary and became a mashgiach for the community. "Our time in Calgary was a very fulfilling four years. Calgary is a small but very caring and active Jewish community," he says.

After four years, the Allmans returned to Toronto, so their children could have a Jewish education. His son has made aliyah and recently completed army service. His daughter enters York University next month.

Allman says that he never thought about becoming a ritual director, but a friend suggested he consider the position at Beth Emeth. "I asked what the job entailed and my friend said I had to know how to scramble eggs. I decided to apply."

He adds that although he had the religious requirements for the job, "when they discovered my knowledge of computers, I think that's what did it."

And he has never regretted taking the position. "I am Orthodox. I have developed an appreciation for the scholarship of the Conservative leadership. Beth Emeth is one of the few Conservative traditional synagogues in Canada."

When Allman speaks of his work at the shul – his responsibilities include the weekday minyanim, teaching bar mitzvah boys, involvement in life cycle events and the care of ritual property, including 21 sifrei Torah – he is filled with joy.

"I enjoy the administrative work which brings me in contact with the membership of 1200 families," he says, and he is pleased to meet the members who don't come often.

"When they come to say Kaddish to honour a parent, or to plan a simchah, some people become involved and some are now on our board."

An ebullient and communicative man, Allman says, "I don't know when, but our goal is to move back to Israel someday."

Artist was friends with Einstein's daughter

By Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Frieda Sohn's sculptures can be found in collections in North America and Europe.

She recently had an exhibit at Toronto's Forest Hill Place Retirement Residence, where she lives.

A year ago, Sohn, who is 94, moved to the city, where her daughter, Judith Ostrower, lives.

About Toronto, she says,"I guess I can be described as an alien here. If you put me on the street here in Toronto, I don't know where I am as I'm not familiar with the geography of Toronto because my daughter always takes my everywhere."

She is familiar with the city's museums and galleries as over the years she visited Toronto regularly to see her daughter.

Sohn says that she became fascinated with art at an early age. "And the fascination has never lost its hold on me," she adds.

Some of her sculptures and several of her prints are on display in her apartment.

Sohn describes her work as naturalistic. "You have nature in mind, but change it into sculptural form. It can take many different sculptural forms," she says.

"My sculptures are abstract. They are taken from reality and changed into abstract forms."

Frieda Sohn became fascinated with art at an early age. "And the fascination has never lost its hold on me," she says.

She has worked in stone, wood, clay, alabaster, marble, ceramics and bronze.

Sohn, née Rosengarten, was born in Lithuania. Her family came to New York when she was 12 years old. She was then enrolled in high school, where she learned English.

"I took English classes for one month. The other subjects were easy because I had taken all the other subjects in Lithuania," she says.

She was a German major, French minor and later an art major at Hunter College in New York. She worked toward a master's degree at Columbia University and studied at Beaux Arts Institute in New York, as well as attending other art schools.

After she married, she became the art director of Bronx House in New York. She also taught sculpture at the Baltimore Museum of Art for 20 years.

As a student at Columbia University, Sohn became close friends with Margot Einstein. Sohn has a photograph of Albert Einstein, Margot's father, along with an article about him, on one of her apartment walls.

"I was invited to spend several weekends with their family in Princeton. He was wonderful. He called me Friedel and told me many great stories," Sohn says.

She is a member of the hall of fame of the Alumni Association of Hunter College and has been honoured by the Baltimore Museum of Art.

Specialist focuses on relationship between eating disorders and psychological disturbances

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Allan Kaplan, head of the program for eating disorders at Toronto General Hospital, still recalls, almost 30 years later, his first experience with a girl with an eating disorder.

"It was the first year I was working on a ward, and this girl had been placed on the internal medicine floor. She was losing weight and no one knew what was wrong."

After he was assigned to her, he says, she revealed that she had been inducing herself to vomit. "I immediately began reading up on the subject."

He then heard a talk on anorexia nervosa by Dr. Paul Garfinkle, now president and CEO of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, "and he became my mentor. He influenced me tremendously in my future work."

After completing a residency in psychiatry, Kaplan, 53, originally from Providence, R.I., went on to get a master's degree in nutrition at University of Toronto.

"I was trained as a doctor and a psychiatrist, but I needed training as a researcher and a nutritionist."

He was always interested in the interaction between the brain and behaviour, he says, "and I saw myself focusing on one area.

"I wanted to treat seriously ill people, and I wanted to study the connection between what went on in the brains [of young, sick people] and their behaviour. I actually saw myself doing what I'm doing now," says Kaplan, now the Loretta Anne Rogers chair in eating disorders and a professor of psychiatry at University of Toronto.

Allan Kaplan

The prevalence of eating disorders has increased since the '70s, he says, but that is almost exclusively due to bulimia, a condition in which people maintain their normal weight through binge eating and purging. "This is a condition that can go on for years."

Bulimics tend to have a difficult relationship with food; when they're not eating, they're binging, he says.

Over time, problems will show up, but the disease is not as acute as anorexia. People with bulimia, which is often romanticized by Hollywood, do not tend to die, says Kaplan.

The evidence of anorexia is much clearer, he says, because patients lose a lot of weight. "They look skeletal and clearly unwell, they run into all kinds of [internal] medical problems, and they may collapse. By definition, however, they deny that anything is wrong.

"Medical problems occur much more quickly in young people than in adults because they have less weight to lose. If a 13-year-old loses 30 pounds, she could be in big trouble.

"Anorexia has the highest mortality rate of any psychiatric problem. Next to accidents, it is the second-highest cause of deaths in adolescents, and those with anorexia have a 12 per cent higher rate of dying."

People with eating disorders not only have a disturbed eating behaviour, they also show characteristic psychological disturbances, he says. "They have problems with self-esteem and impulsivity, and [often] act out.

"An eating disorder is much more complicated than wishing to be thin. It is a way of coping with psychological problems. It is not about thinness – no weight is good enough."

Some studies have shown that up to 70 per cent of those with eating disorders have been influenced by their genetic makeup. "Eating disorders run in families, and women are more at risk because their brains are more sensitive."

Kaplan says he can pick out a child who is at risk of developing an eating disorder. "It is a girl who may have a mother with an eating disorder, a father who is an alcoholic, and there [is a tendency] for mood disorders to run in her family. This starts to create a picture.

"It does not mean, however, that she will develop an eating disorder. Genes only load the gun, environment pulls the trigger. We all have genetic predispositions. We want to make our environment as healthy as possible."

Especially in the Jewish community, Kaplan says, there is more stigma attached to eating disorders than to any other psychiatric problem.

"There is even more stigma than with schizophrenia. People tend to think that those with anorexia can just start to eat. There is a lot of parent bashing going on.

"The problem is way more complicated than that. We must destigmatize eating disorders so people will come forward for treatment, and we can do what we can do to prevent environmental factors."

Prevention includes speaking to girls about self-esteem, respect for others and healthy eating. "They need to learn not to focus on superficial appearances.

"We need to reach these kids when they are young, because once adolescence sets in, the risk factors are in place."

Cantor's 'day job' is endocrinology

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Members of Darchei Noam Congregation know Rob Silver in his role as part-time volunteer cantor, but his patients know the Toronto endocrinologist and University of Toronto department of medicine professor in a different capacity.

And supporters of LifeBeat, an annual fundraiser for a rotating array of medical causes, may recognize Silver as one of the musical variety show's longtime singers. He spent seven years as LifeBeat's musical director, and for this year's performances in June, was one of the principal vocal arrangers. The show, which features a cast of health-care professionals, has been held for the last several years at the Premiere Dance Theatre at Harbourfront Centre.

Silver, a native of Saint John, N.B., comes from a medical family. His late father, Samuel, was an ophthalmologist, and his two brothers are also doctors.

"For as long as I remember, I wanted to be a physician. It just seemed to be a natural evolution for me," said Silver in his office at the University Health Network's Toronto Western Hospital, surrounded by framed diplomas, teaching awards and LifeBeat posters.

Although his initial area of interest was neurology, Silver changed course as a medical student at Dalhousie University. A Type 1 diabetic since age 11, Silver, who is now 51, began his studies "very determined to stay away from endocrinology."

[Frances Kraft photo]

His intentions changed after an interactive seminar on diabetes in his third year of medical school. Because of his personal experience, he basically "took over" the session.

On his way out, the seminar facilitator, walking with him, said, " 'You know, Rob, it would be a damn shame if you didn't pursue endocrinology as a career.' And that really had an impact. It's funny how a moment here, an experience there, can be life-changing."

Silver said he feels "very blessed" to have the support of his wife Joelle and their three children, who range in age from 13 to 20, as he juggles his "day job" with duties at Darchei Noam and, seasonally, for LifeBeat. Without his family's support, he said, his involvements, which extend professionally to program development and numerous committee memberships, wouldn't be possible.

"I'd like to think my involvements have served as a kind of model to my children as to how they can accommodate extracurricular things into their daily schedule, and how it really makes their lives complete.

"And they've really done that very well," he said, noting that his two older children each received special high school awards for completing more than 500 hours of community service (750 hours in one case), well beyond the minimum requirement.

Silver's membership and volunteer work at Darchei Noam, where he is one of two "roshei chazzanut" (heads of chazzanut), keeps him sane, he said. He estimates that he reads Torah on Shabbat about 40 to 50 per cent of the time, and leads services even more often. He has also served as chazzan at a number of life-cycle events.

Darchei Noam – which has grown from 60 to more than 300 families in the two decades that the Silvers have been members – reminds him of Saint John because of its sense of community.

Silver had little in the way of formal music training while growing up, but became very involved in amateur theatre, including musicals, in high school and university. At one point, he appeared in five productions in nine months. Playing Hamlet in Grade 12 still stands out for him as "the ultimate."

"I've always been the kind of person [who], the busier I am, the more effective and efficient I become. I love to keep myself busy."

Silver credits his mother, Sylvia, a nutritionist by training and "a stickler for organization," for his ability to multi-task effectively.

His theatre background is directly related to his affinity for teaching, in terms of being able to communicate and perform, he believes. There are 19 teaching awards listed on his 24-page curriculum vitae.

Would he want his children to pursue a career in medicine? "Our feeling as parents is that we don't want to overly influence them. We want them to be happy and productive. [That said], I still think medicine is a wonderful career, and I'm as excited about what I do now as I was 20 years ago."

Families leaving for safety, and a better life – not politics

Most of the immigrants at that time were married men and women in their 30s and 40s who came with school- or university-age children.

Today, immigrant families are leaving less for political reasons and more for fear of their children's safety and a desire to provide them with a better life.

Many are also leaving in order to try to keep their families together by moving now, while they can, rather than being left alone with their children spread throughout the world, later.

Some older people arrived to join their families who have already been here for a number of years.

Mannie Stein arrived with his wife in 1988, when he was 68. They came to join their sons Michael and David, who had come as young single men years before.

In Durban, where he lived, Stein was a surgeon with his own practice who was involved with the first kidney transplant and vascular work done in Durban.

A year ago, he published his autobiography, written after his immigration to Canada.

There has also been an influx of young adult immigrants, mainly due to a lack of jobs in South Africa, but also because they want to succeed in a "First World" country.

The times have changed. Since the "early settlers" knew how hard the integration period was for them, they formed a group, primarily under Ronnie Rath, a South African émigré employed by UJA Federation, and began Sajac (Southern African Jewish Association of Canada – including those from Zimbabwe), which has now been running for close to 30 years.

Sandler, who is one of the original Sajac founders, said the organization was created "as a means of helping South Africans find their feet and become part of Toronto society and Jewish Canadian society," rather than as a mutually exclusive club keeping them connected to home.

The group ran with that focus from its inception in 1976 until the early 1980s when immigration from South Africa declined.

Although certain Sajac activities, such as the Sajac Seniors Social club (today known as the Sajac Social Club) continued, major activity decreased in the early '80s and was only revived again at the beginning of 1987 under Colin Baskind, who became and remains president.

From then on, the focus of Sajac changed somewhat.

"Because so many of us had left our families in South Africa, we had to find friends here who would essentially become our family," said Heather Super, Sajac secretary and editor of the biannual Sajac news magazine, which ran from 1977 until 1982 and was revived in February 1989.

A "welcome wagon" was established, where someone who was more settled in the country would go to meet a new family, with a small basket of goodies and information on life in Toronto.

Sajac would also host picnics and braais (or barbecues as they are known here) and individual families would invite those "just off the boat" for Shabbat dinners and other family-oriented get-togethers.

An important objective of Sajac was and continues to be helping new immigrants find accommodation and employment, which in turn, helps them to settle in more easily.

"The key is that we really do make the effort, and today we have Canadians coming to us looking for South African staff because they want people with the good South African work ethic," said Baskind.

The Sajac magazine is an important part of the organization. This advertisement-funded magazine is sent out free of charge to everyone who chooses to be on the database before Pesach and again before Rosh Hashanah.

Sajac sends out magazines to 2,500 homes, but Super and Baskind stress that there are many others who either have opted not to be on the mailing list or have not heard about the organization. They estimate that there are probably no more than 25,000 Jewish South Africans here.

The 140-page publication generates $16,000 and includes a directory of former South Africans offering certain services or with companies or practices in Toronto.

All revenue goes towards the Sajac Bursary Fund, which awards bursaries to Jewish children of South African origin who need funds to help them further their university or college education. "As long as people support us, we are able to support these students," Super said.

One comment made by every immigrant interviewed – whether they have been here for 30 years or four – was that, if anything, it was a crime for their children to have left South Africa because they have grown up to do really well in both the business and the professional worlds.

"The loss of these young people is a 'brain drain' on South Africa because they could have contributed so much to present day society there and helped to build up the fledgling democracy," Baskind said.

Socially and culturally, former South Africans have adapted well to life in Canada. Many feel they are fully integrated and have many good Canadian friends, while others seem to stick to the South African crowd that dominates the Thornhill area (called "doornkop" – Afrikaans for Thornhill – by many) where many former South Africans have settled. "It all depends on where you live and work" said Baskind.

For those who arrived during the main immigration waves, many, like Super, only have friends who are former South African emigrés.

However, in most cases, the children who came with their parents and attended school here have integrated fully into Canadian society through friendships with their Canadian peers. Others who chose to live in areas not populated by many South Africans, have made friends with neighbours and work colleagues.

In some cases, immigrants have chosen not to be involved with former South Africans at all. Today, one would be surprised to hear these people are not born and bred Canadians.

South Africans maintain their customs in synagogues

One area where South Africans have made marked changes to create an environment that makes them feel comfortable is in the synagogues.

In South Africa, there is no Conservative community and the Reform community is very small. The shuls, Jewish venues and such are all run on Orthodox principles, but many people who go to shul will drive there and most do not keep strictly kosher although they are very traditional.

Some found Canadian shuls where they felt comfortable and they got very involved. For example, Stephen Held, who moved to Canada 30 years ago with his British wife, Barbara, has been involved with the Shaar Shalom congregation ever since.

"We arrived a few days before Rosh Hashanah," he said. "We chose to attend Shaar Shalom for yom tov and went to pick up our tickets. By the time we had left the shul, we had meals booked for the whole of yom tov. We were just made to feel so welcome."

Other South Africans would go to Orthodox shuls and feel ostracized because they weren't shomrei Shabbat and did not observe the kashrut laws, yet at the same time, they didn't feel comfortable at the Conservative shuls.

To make themselves more comfortable, a group of South Africans got together and created a "South African style" shul.

That first one was Kehillat Shaarei Torah, founded 25 years ago.

"In South Africa, shuls are the focus of the community, in Canada they are not," said Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, the spiritual leader at the shul.

Another difference is that in South Africa, Friday night is the most popular Shabbat service, not Saturday morning, while in Canada, the situation is reversed.

Today the congregation is about half South African and half people from other groups, including some Torontonians, with all the founding members still at the shul.

"We have lots of membership turnover because of people becoming more religious and not wanting to drive to shul," said Rabbi Tradburks of the synagogue, which is on Bayview Avenue near York Mills Road.

As is the case in most shuls, the attendance is split – a third go every Shabbat, a third go occasionally and another third only go for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

On the High Holy Days and at other special times, a choir is brought into the shul to give it a further South African feel.

Rabbi Tradburks said the unique thing about South Africans is that they are a community that has really transplanted itself and maintained its traditions. However, he was worried about the nature of traditional South African community life in years to come, as he feels the power of communal structures is not enough to carry people along in their traditions for the next generation. "The next generation needs to become more observant or they will be lost", he said.

South African choir [Benji Feldman photo]

Today, Chabad Lubavitch of Markham is considered "the South African" shul, since 75 per cent of its members have a South African background.

Nineteen years ago, Rabbi Avraham Plotkin was fresh out of a kollel in New York when the Rebbe sent him as a shaliach to Toronto.

In December 1985, he bought a house and opened up a shul in his house.

In September 1987, he met with a few South African families and started Friday night services. "South Africans know how to make a good Friday night," he said.

The match was complete. "They were a community looking for a congregation and I was a congregation looking for a community," Rabbi Plotkin joked.

Although the community is very traditional, most are not observant. The shul is Orthodox.

Everything at the shul is done South African style and the rabbi says he has learned to appreciate the South Africanisms and their way of doing things. The shul has a choir which, the rabbi says, has become a tool for outreach because even those who can't read the siddur well, feel "included and inspired" by the choir.

Funerals are also arranged in the traditional way common in South Africa, with the shul offering a "middleman" to help take care of things so that the family doesn't have to.

They also have a "rolls royce" kiddush every Shabbat, similar to those at shuls back home.

"The South Africans have a strong sense of community and they are there for each other in good times and bad and the shul provides them with a focal point to be able to really rally around one another," said Rabbi Plotkin.

In all spheres, the South Africans have come, set up roots, become a real part of the Jewish community and embraced Toronto, really making the city their own.

The immigrants all said that no matter what the circumstances, the initial transition is hard, the weather is completely different and most either love or hate the winters.

But if one comes with an open mind and is realistic about one's expectations, life in Canada becomes full of opportunities, freedom and an overall good way of life, they added.

Feel like a STRANGER at Synagogue?

A Synagogue is not just another institution – or rather, it shouldn't feel that way.

At Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, we strive to create a warm and comforting atmosphere within which to nurture our youth, express our Judaism, and celebrate all life cycle commemorations – a place where everyone feels a sense of belonging. And to show you what we mean you are invited to attend our second annual

OPEN HOUSE

Wednesday September 7th, 2005

at 7:00 p.m.

Non Members & Members Welcome!

Most open houses try to get you to come out and see what they have to offer. We are different.

We want you to come out and let us get to know you. Ok, so we may also put our best face forward, but only to give you the opportunity to -

- MEET OUR CLERGY, program directors, and many of our members and volunteers;
- LEARN ABOUT the programs and services available at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda;
- FIND OUT what membership provides – including reasonable fixed-price fees which are not based on income and incentives for new members;
- OBTAIN High Holy Day tickets as a new member, or for our auxiliary services for unaffiliated guests; and
- VISIT OUR FACILITIES and see for yourself why Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda hosts more simchas than almost any other Conservative synagogue in the city.

Don't be a stranger!

A BEBY WELCOME PROGRAM FOR GTA NEWCOMERS

If you have relocated to the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) since September 1st, 2004, we invite you to spend the High Holy days in our warm and welcoming environment as our guest. Experience our Synagogue and its programs and facilities for a three-month period beginning this September, without obligation. For more information, please call Julian Lewin, BEBY Executive Director at 416 633-3838.

PENCIL US IN!

There's something for everyone at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda starting this September 2005:

Sept 10	AVRUM ROSENSWEIG, CJN columnist and Director of Ve'Ahavta, on "Tikun Olam"
Sept 14	ISRAELI FOLK DANCING every Wed. at 8 p.m.
